NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

CHRISTMAS DAY in the Belgian Hospitals in Calais was made bright with many devices for giving the men a pleasant time. We are glad to say that the Belgian Hospital Fund took its share in the festivities. Our devoted friend and colleague Mr. Kelland spent Christmas Day in visiting the wards and distributing cigarettes and words of good cheer to the men. It was for him a thoroughly congenial task. The past year has made him a very familiar figure in these homes of loneliness and pain, and wherever he goes he brings cheerfulness and good hope with him. Needless to say his round of Christmas visits gave immense pleasure, and has drawn the ties of friendship which bind us to the doctors and patients in the hospitals still closer.

A LETTER just received from Mr. Kelland is one of deep interest, for it brings us another urgent call for help. It is one advantage of our personal methods that we are continually making discoveries. A recent visit to a convalescent depot in a town in the north of France, which following the usual etiquette in these matters must be nameless, revealed a state of things which we must help to the best of our ability. This small military hospital is placed in the vast buildings of a monastery. The rest of the establishment has been turned into a civilian hospital for 600 refugees. On the military side the medical needs are not great, but comforts and amusements are sorely lacking. We shall do our best to supply these aids to cheerfulness and courage as quickly as possible.

BUT it is to the civilian hospital that we want to call special attention. Here what Mr. Kelland saw must be described in his own words :—

"The refugee hospital is a huge place and contains 600 men, women and children. You wander through corridor after corridor, with cells branching off and here a great room and there a chapel, all littered up with the refuse of humanity, old men weak and feeble, mutilated and crippled and ill, women of all ages, some mutilated, ill, old, others young and strong enough, and children of all ages and sizes, some at school (there are three schoolrooms), some sewing, some scrubbing, most playing : others in isolated cellules with diphtheria, croup, scarlet fever, measles. I came upon a bathroom where a sister was struggling with nine little animals. There were two baths and in each a small boy, aged about 6 and standing over each another small boy aged perhaps about 10 scrubbing his head, and the others were larking about anyhow and they were all happy—and they all had croup ! The saddest room I saw was the hospital ward for old men—there were fifteen, some ill but most mutilated—one with both legs gone, another who had lost an arm and a leg, one with half his face blown away There is a ward for women too, but I did not see it."

MR. KELLAND talked over the whole situation with the doctor in charge. On the medical side the place is fairly well equipped, but there is a great shortage of underclothes, bed-linen, kitchen utensils, playthings for the children and many other things. As Mr. Kelland says, "It will be a long time before this hole is filled up. I promised him a lot then and there." That promise has been already redeemed in part, for fortunately there was a certain amount of civilian clothing in our store at Calais, and that was sent by motor transport the next day. And now once again we appeal to our readers to give us what we need. We want clothes—they must be in good condition or they are not worth sending out—for men, women, and children ; and we want money for many other necessaries. The picture of these people, who have been driven from their homes and suffered so terribly, will not soon fade from our minds. There is no good mourning over their hard fate. We must do our best to help them.

THE King has sent a Christmas message to the men in the Navy and the Army. It strikes a note of trust in the personnel of our forces and of quiet confidence in the issue, which should breathe fresh courage into hearts that are beginning to falter under the burden of the long strain.

"Another Christmas," so the message runs, "finds all the resources of the Empire still engaged in war, and I desire to convey on my own behalf and on behalf of the Queen a heartfelt Christmas greeting and our good wishes for the New Year to all who on sea and land are upholding the honour of the British name.

"In the officers and men of my Navy, on whom the security of the Empire depends, I repose, in common with all my subjects, a trust that is absolute.

"On the officers and men of my Armies, whether now in France, in the East, or in other fields, I rely with an equal faith, confident that their devotion, their valour, and their self-sacrifice will, under God's guidance, lead to victory and an honourable peace."

A PICTURESQUE element disappears from our army in France with the removal of the Indian troops. As we have seen them amid summer surroundings, encamped in the woods or riding their horses on the roads behind the lines, they give a touch of oriental romance to the scene, and they have already proved themselves to be splendid soldiers in many a stubborn fight. But the rain and the chill winter climate must have been terribly trying to their physique, and it is no doubt a wise decision to remove them to some more suitable field of action. They have done much by their presence in the Western armies to convince the world of the solidarity of the Empire. The special message from the King, which was delivered personally by the Prince of Wales, has in it the ring of cordial gratitude and admiration, and gives the assurance that so far from their services being dispensed with they simply go to prove their valour elsewhere. "You leave France with a just pride in honourable deeds already achieved and with my assured confidence that your proved valour and experience will contribute to further victories in the new fields of action to which you go."

NOTHING has been more remarkable during the past year than the unimpaired cohesion among the Allies. It has stood the strain of disappointment, of some misunderstandings, of many trying moments. It has also been proof against jealousy and suspicion and the poison of German intrigue. This is a moral victory of far-reaching significance for the future. It is also a convincing proof that the ends for which we are allied are in themselves unselfish and good. If we were inspired chiefly by selfishness or fear, the power of acting together would have given place before now to competitive interests and rival policies, and Germany would have begun already to make profit out of our dissensions. As it is her challenge to the broad principles of civilisation has created its appropriate answer in the closest moral federation among nations, which has ever been known. It must be one of our chief tasks in the coming months to strengthen and enrich this mutual understanding, both in the political sphere and in the unseen realms of the imagination and the spirit.

THE newspapers are full of rumours about the coming of compulsion for the unmarried men who have failed to attest under Lord Derby's scheme. No official figures are known, nor can information about the policy of the Cabinet be more than guess-work till Mr. Asquith makes his statement in the House of Commons next week. Meanwhile it is wise to keep our judgment in reserve, and to refrain from heated criticism until we know what the Cabinet mean to do and why they mean to do it. The failure of a large number of men to attest is deeply to be regretted for two reasons. It creates a situation of grave difficulty in the country, which might have been avoided by a little more public spirit. It also reveals a faulty appreciation of the duty, at the present moment, to put public usefulness above private aims. We do not doubt that many of the excuses, which a man considers valid for himself, are honourable and just. A large proportion of them might be upheld on appeal. But a whole country cannot be mobilised for self-defence and the vindication of a righteous cause, unless there is general willingness to submit to the discipline of accepting the task which is appointed for us instead of sticking to the post which we have chosen for ourselves.

THE effect of the war upon the statistics of pauperism has been very remarkable. After the first few weeks of financial uncertainty there has been a steady decline. No doubt the shortage of labour owing to enlistment and the abundance of money in many working-class homes have been the chief factors in this reduction. Instead of the severe suffering, which was anticipated, our workhouses tell a story of prosperity which has no parallel since official figures have been compiled. We cannot, however, look upon this pleasant picture with complete satisfaction. The circumstances are entirely abnormal. The ease with which money is earned at the present time is probably unfitting many people for the shrinkage of income and the thrifty living which they will have to face later on. The soldiers are enduring the hard discipline of war in the trenches. The workers at home will have to learn its meaning in the lean years, when everybody must go back to his ordinary labour and the Government, staggering under the burden of colossal loans, will no longer pour forth money with a lavish hand.

THE most striking feature in this shrinkage of pauperism is the practical disappearance of vagrants in London. This homeless class is recruited continually from people who drift in from other places to try their luck or to pick up a living in the streets. Suddenly this strange population, which had grown markedly less in recent years, has vanished. When every allowance has been made for those who have been absorbed by the demands of the army and the labour market, there must be a large residuum of people, without any economic value as workers, whose whereabouts is a mystery. The actual state of things, so far as it can be revealed in statistics, is described in the following passage from The Times' annual review :—

> With reference to casuals, five years ago in July on a Friday night 1,081 persons were relieved in the London wards; on the corresponding night in July, 1914, the number had fallen to 170. Since then, through the war months there has been a further decline, until Friday night, the 11th inst., when all the London wards were empty. The casual pauper has entirely disappeared for the time being. But the situation is even more favourable than this when we take into account the homeless class generally. The number of persons in casual wards before the war formed only a small section of the homeless wanderers in London on any night. For some years the London County Council have taken a census of homeless persons and the returns show a steady decline in numbers. On the night of February 18, 1910, the total was 6,644 persons, of whom 1,778 were in shelters not provided with beds, 969 in the streets, 2,790 in free lodging-houses, and 1,107 in casual wards. In 1914, on the night of February 13, the number was 2,881 persons, of whom 106 were in shelters, 434 in the streets, 2,006 in free lodging-houses, and 335 in casual wards, or a decrease of 3,763 in five years. There has been a gradual reduction in numbers since this date, and to-day it may be said that the homeless as a class have also disappeared, at any rate from public view.

THERE has long been a warm feeling for the people of Hungary in this country. For ourselves admiration for their heroic memories has been strengthened by ties of personal friendship. The fact that our conflict with the Central Powers has involved us in war with them is one of the tragedies of the present situation. It was accordingly with special pleasure that we read a letter by Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, a tried friend of Hungary, in The Westminster Gazette on Wednesday, in which he gives the following translation of a memorandum which has been sent recently to all school teachers in Hungary: "The Royal Hungarian Minister for Education requests all teachers to pay special attention in the coming term to the respect and honour due to our enemies; that no hatred or contempt should enter the minds of the children against the brave men with whom their fathers are in deadly combat; and that hate or contempt is not to be cultivated in the youthful minds." Mr. Shrubsole adds: "Although both Hungary and Austria are now to a large extent controlled by Germany, it is evident from the foregoing that Hungary has not become infected by the German disease of malignant hatred."

NEW YEAR'S DAY.

It is New Year's Day, but we have only the old message which it has been our burden and our privilege to speak during the whole of the past twelve months. The change in the calendar does not alter the situation or the spirit in which brave men must meet it. In part the message is one of warning. We have sounded that note again and again, and we must continue to do so as long as we are exposed to the temptations of impatience and despondency or the shallow complaints of the grumbler. It is long duties which test character most severely. A few days of swift and shining action, however dangerous it may be, make the heart beat faster and inspire us with the joy of combat. When months are added to weeks and a whole year slips away without bringing the end in sight, we begin to be conscious of the numbing power of custom, and some loss of excitement and even of curiosity in the mood with which we watch the changing drama of the war. We do not doubt that our whole energy is still the condition of success, but we allow ourselves to forget that every lapse from cheerfulness into grumbling adds strength to the enemy. Private cares may easily paralyse us for our public duties. Our whole life must be taken up into the cause. For all of us it is the only path of virtue and safety.

This warning is more needed by us than by the other combatants; for hitherto there has been very little interruption to our ordinary life. We have known nothing of the horror of invasion, and the possibility of it hardly enters into our dreams. Trade has been good; money has been plentiful; and a high standard of domestic comfort has been maintained. Ordinary interests and personal ambitions tend to reassert themselves. Scattered all over the country there are still little groups of people who argue and discuss and criticise their neighbours, or affect an attitude of detachment, in a way which would be impossible if the fiery discipline of war had touched them more closely. The absence of fierce passion is in itself a good thing. It springs in part from a genuine elevation of mind; but it may also be a symptom of some lack of imaginative sympathy with the wrongs of others. Even now, with minds surfeited with a diet of newspapers, many of us have only a weak realisation of the miseries which have been endured by our Allies. If in one revealing flash we could see things just as they are, the whole life of the country would become simpler and more determined, and all our heated arguments about compulsion would lose their meaning, because there would be nobody left to be compelled. It is because we have felt the presence of these dangers and the degree to which we are exposed to them, that we have sounded the note of warning so often during the past year. Nothing must be allowed to weaken our resolution or to blur the clearness of our vision. There is the one path of duty for us to tread, and it is only as we tread it firmly, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, that we can do our part to vindicate the cause of justice and save the world from an overwhelming moral disaster.

But to warn men of danger is only a small part of our duty. The best preservative of faith, and of the courage which is born of faith, must always be sought in a renewal of our loyalty to the goodness of the cause which we are pledged to serve. It is a noble thing for a man to defend his home and to protect the delicate fabric of his national life from insolent wrong. But in this conflict there are other motives of a more enlarging kind. We are not merely protecting ourselves, though we are right to do that with all our strength. We are obeying the high claims of justice and chivalry, and there are no motives which surpass these in their power to make men unselfish and unite them with the infinite purposes of God. Did it need this terrible crime against civilisation to bring us back to a clear perception of the place of justice in the counsels of the Almighty? The word was heard too seldom in our religious language. We disliked its severity, and found the secret of the Christian gospel in something softer and more sentimental; and as we did so the nerve went out of our religion. The love of the New Testament is not distinct from the righteousness of the Old Testament prophets. It is a flower which can only grow on that granite foundation. We believe even more firmly than we did then, that in August, 1914, there was only one course which it was possible for honourable, truthful, and just men to take. That initial act of justice binds all our actions, and gives them dignity and spiritual significance, till the just end is achieved. And it makes it natural and right for us to take this heavy burden of duty with us into the presence of God and seek for it the light and support of the Christian religion. If we could only have kept faith with Christianity, as some men presume to tell us, by repudiating our obligations and paying public homage to the Father of lies, most of us would not have shrunk from honouring truthfulness first of all. But we have not so learned Christ. When the clear call of justice sounds in our ears, his love and gentleness and peace do not point another way. It is only when we do the will of God, in other words, when we act justly and fulfil all the obligations of truth and honour, that we can begin to understand the saving power of the gospel. For love that is divorced from justice is a love which in no sense reflects the character of God.

We have also tried to make the appeal to chivalry ring high and clear above the tumult of our ordinary days. To us this call of our Allies, who have suffered so terribly for us as well as in their own cause, has come with an insistence which must be shared by all who have seen the cruel havoc of the war at close quarters. As we sit down to write our weekly article there is always present before our eyes the spectacle of broken lives, the wounds and the loneliness, which have become so familiar to us in the Belgian hospitals. We remember, too, the stories of ghastly outrage and unconquerable heroism which we have heard. The call to the chivalry of the young manhood of England, which comes from these scenes and a thousand others, is as a fire in our bones, and we should be doing less than our duty if we did not do our utmost to help them to realise what it means. We are not in love with soldiering for its own sake, nor has our judgment grown dizzy with military passion. What we have written on this subject has been dictated by the pure instincts of pity and an overmastering desire for fellowship with these men in their sufferings. To be young enough to obey the call is a glorious privilege, if it is regarded in the right way; for the only effective answer which chivalry can make is in the language of swift and resolute action. Obedience without terms has become the test of generous manhood.

Such are some of the leading principles and ideas which have guided our policy and influenced everything which we have written on the war during the past year. In the critical days which lie before us we can wish for nothing better for the country, or for ourselves so far as we are enabled to serve the country's cause, than that there should be no faltering in our words, no weakening in our purpose. We want to be simple in thought, firm in speech, strong in action. All those who in these perilous times are set to be the guides of public opinion and the guardians of public virtue must make it their aim to ward off the first stealthy attacks of the spirit of selfishness, indolence, or fear, and so to press home the appeals of justice and chivalry that even the deaf may hear, and men who never did great or noble things before will spring to attention, with the light of heaven-born purpose in their eyes.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE CHAMBERED NAUTILUS.

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feign,
Sails the unshadowed main,—
The venturous bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings
In gulfs enchanted, where the Siren sings,
And coral reefs lie bare,
Where the cold sea-maids rise to sun their streaming hair.

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;
Wrecked is the ship of pearl!
And every chambered cell,
Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,
As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,
Before thee lies revealed,—
Its irised ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!
Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous coil;
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,
Built up its idle door,
Stretched in his last-found home, and knew the old no more.

Thanks for the heavenly message brought by thee,
Child of the wandering sea,
Cast from her lap, forlorn!
From thy dead lips a clearer note is born
Than ever Triton blew from wreathèd horn!
While on mine ear it rings,
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that sings: —
Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea!

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

If we have rightly interpreted the Providential order of the world, it is vain for any people to affect a policy of isolation from the great drama of its time,—to hug itself in the security of pacific gains, and look down upon the strife of justice from the window of cold neutrality. It is the glory of every civilised, especially every historic land, that its life ceases to be solitary; that its roots run through the very substance of the world; that it has pledges of honour to redeem, and conscious limits to the field of its desires. In the confederated family of nations, all own allegiance to the conscience of their common humanity, and are bound in a virtual league to guard its individual sanctities. When they have sat together round the council table of universal justice, each will retire to its place wiser and less selfish-hearted; struck with excellence other than its own, yet rendered by the very difference more faithful to the native heritage. To a nation, as to the individual, self-knowledge,—the right at once of humility and self-respect,—comes not in loneliness and seclusion, but in the testing of affection and the entanglements of sympathy.

NEW YEAR'S PRAYER.

[The following prayer was written by Dr. Johnson on New Year's Day, 1850, when he was 40 years old. It bears the date "January 1, after 3 in the morning."]

Almighty God, by whose will I was created, and by whose providence I have been sustained, by whose mercy I have been called to the knowledge of my Redeemer, and by whose grace whatever I have thought or acted acceptable to thee has been inspired and directed; grant, O Lord, that in reviewing my past life, I may recollect thy mercies to my preservation, in whatever state thou preparest for me; that in affliction I may remember how often I have been succoured; and in prosperity may know and confess from whose hand the blessing is received. Let me, O Lord, so remember my sins, that I may abolish them by true repentance, and so improve the year to which thou hast graciously extended my life, and all the years which thou shalt yet allow me, that I may hourly become purer in thy sight; so that I may live in thy fear and die in thy favour, and find mercy at the last day, for the sake of Jesus Christ.

Amen.

VERSE.

TWO LETTERS.

I. From Home.

Write, write again just as you talked
When you were with us face to face;
Or when a merry band we walked
The country lanes with easy pace.

We hear your laughter, and your voice
Comes stealing through the old sweet song;
It calms our doubts, it sings "Rejoice
Our hopes are high, our hearts are strong."

Dear lads; but do you understand
How parting makes the old things new;
And how we love our native land
Because our native land is you.

We have the feeling, mind and will
To see, to know, to recognise,
That British lads from school and mill
Are soldiers of self-sacrifice.

We bow our heads in gratitude—
Yes, Honour is a living thing!
The world must praise the brave and good,
The poets of all nations sing.

Write, write again just as the words
Brightly, impetuously come;
Your first quick thoughts are singing birds—
Our hearts the cages here at home.

II. FROM ABROAD.

WHEN your best billet is a barn,
And your best drawing-room a trench,
You can't expect a finished yarn
With apt quotations from the French.

We like that little touch of yours
About the rambles and the glees;
You bring the scent of heathery moors,
The murmur of the brooks and trees.

Here all the scent and sight is mud;
It holds you in its oozy thrall;
It boasts "I am prime evil-good,
And may become your all in all."

Patience and courage is our cry;
Patience to meet dull duty's cares
With smiling faces, and to try
And catch the sunbeams unawares.

Courage is keen, and will not fail,
Courage is like the morning lark;
But Patience is the nightingale
That cheers you when the hours are dark.

And mother reads our favourite book!....
Tell her we know a cosy bed,
Tell her we love the "ingle-nook,"
Tell her home's best when all is said.

"CARRY ON."

AN ADDRESS TO THOSE STILL AT SCHOOL.

BY THE HEADMASTER OF WILLASTON.

A YEAR ago we were hoping, with hope that in many cases amounted to belief, that before 1915 came to an end the war would be over. How near those hopes have been to realisation it is useless to speculate—the fact remains that the war is still in progress. There has been talk of peace—but it was only talk. We know that no end is possible yet. The work that the Allies have set themselves to do is still far from being accomplished. That it will be accomplished in time we feel more confident now than ever. If we let our thoughts run back to this time last year we shall, I think, find that the magnitude of the task is more fully realised now, especially by ourselves, than it was then; and there has been a corresponding increase in our determination to "see it through." Of that there is abundant proof. Efforts are being made, and service is being offered, on a scale that never entered into our calculations then. The end is not in sight. Yet we must always keep it in mind. For though it is in one sense an end, it is in another sense a beginning—the dawn, as we devoutly hope, of a new and nobler era for mankind. It is of that end, or rather that beginning, that I want to speak, at this time when our thoughts naturally turn to the future, to you, in whose hands the future lies.

Do you remember the great earthquake that destroyed Messina, and other towns in Italy and Sicily, some six years ago? I happened to be passing through the Straits a year later; and as we approached Messina I wondered if I should see any traces of the earthquake. Traces! It was as if the shock had occurred but yesterday. No doubt something had been done to repair the damage; but we could see little sign of it from our ship. It takes more than a year to recover from such a disaster as that. And just such a catastrophe has befallen our world to-day. Indeed, it is as though not only earthquake, but hurricane also, and fire, and flood were overwhelming us. Not only our lives, and the lives of those we love, and all our worldly possessions are in peril: our beliefs and our ideals are assailed as well, and we cannot say what will or will not survive.

We cannot yet realise the extent of the damage. And in some ways we shall never know what we have lost. How can we ever know what contributions to the progress of mankind would have been made by the countless numbers who have been cut off at the outset of their careers? Or by their children after them—the children that will never see the light? We dare not try to imagine it. But one thing we can realise, too often from our own mournful experience—there will be gaps to fill. Who is going to fill them. YOU. It is you, the boys who will be the men of the coming generation, and you, the girls who will become their wives and helpmates—it is you will have to "carry on." You have a tremendous task before you. The devastation caused by this world-earthquake will not be made good in one year or in ten. And you will, each of you, have, as it were, two places to fill, your own, and that of another who has gone. Think of that every time you read a casualty list; for that is what it means to you.

I wonder if you noticed that phrase which I used just now—to "carry on." It is one of the military expressions which are making their way into general use at the present time. An officer calls up his subordinates, when there is a job to be done, explains to them what it is, and issues his orders. Then—"Carry on!" and off they go and do it. The capacity to "carry on" is, above all, what makes the British soldier the splendid fellow that he is. One of the army manuals, in enumerating the objects to be kept in view in developing the soldierly spirit in a man, mentions the following: "To increase his powers of initiative, of self-confidence, and of self-restraint; to train him to obey orders, or to act in the absence of orders for the advantage of his regiment under all conditions." Obedience is of supreme importance—without it no training of any kind is possible; but closely connected with it is the power to act aright when there is no one to obey—the sense of responsibility. This capacity of our soldiers and sailors to "carry on" is illustrated again and again in the stories of their doings. In the South African War, for example, a serjeant-major once found himself, for nearly an hour, in command of a whole battalion, all senior to him being out of action. He "carried on." In the present war I suppose more V.C.'s have been awarded for "carrying on," in one form or another, than for anything else: for instance, to the drummer who assumed control in a trench, rallied his comrades and restored the fortunes of the day in his little corner of the vast conflict.

The spirit implied in "carrying on" is conspicuous in the Army and Navy, but only, perhaps, because there it finds most chances to reveal itself; for it is, if I am not mistaken, one of our national characteristics. It is certainly to be found in our schools. This has been forcibly expressed by some one who said that if an epidemic, or some similar cause, suddenly removed the whole of the masters of a public school, the Head of the School would at once take charge, reporting to the Governors what had happened, but adding that the school was otherwise going on as usual. We shall need that spirit more in the years to come than ever we did in those that are past. Every one of you, as he goes out into the world, will find his responsibilities infinitely greater than he would have done had there been no war. Are you doing your best, here and now, to make yourself fit to undertake them?....

In thinking over what to say to you in this New Year message I have found one of Sir Henry Newbolt's poems running constantly in my head. Those of you who know it — and I hope there are none who do not—will easily guess which it is. Do you know exactly what the title means? 'Vitaï Lampada' is part of a line by the Roman poet Lucretius: Et quasi cursores vitaï lampada tradunt—"As runners they hand on the torch of life." The reference is to a ceremony of the ancient Athenians in honour of certain of their gods, such as Prometheus and Pan. (Read Browning's 'Pheidippides' if you want to know why they honoured Pan.) A chain of runners raced from one point to another bearing a lighted torch, each runner carrying it for a certain distance, and then handing it on to another. The object, especially when two or more "teams" competed, was to bear the torch as quickly as possible without letting it go out. Lucretius likens this to men's lives here on earth—one runs for his allotted span, and another "carries on." And our own poet uses the splendid image to express the life of a school, the members of which change from term to term and year to year, but its spirit remains ever the same:—

This is the word that year by year,
While in her place the school is set,
Every one of her sons must hear,
And none that hears it dare forget.
This they all with a joyful mind
Bear through life like a torch in flame,
And falling fling to the host behind—
"Play up! play up! and play the game!"

And not to our school days only, but to all our life may we apply the image, as the Roman poet did of old. You, boy and girl alike, have a torch passed on to you to bear through life. "So run that ye may obtain"—swiftly and strongly, yet paying good heed that the flame does not go out, but rather burns more and more brightly to the end....Carry on!

SERVICE OF COMMEMORATION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The Committee of the Sunday School Association at their last meeting agreed to ask the Sunday Schools, so far as practicable, to take part in the Service of Commemoration and Dedication which has been arranged for Sunday, January 2. May I ask your help in calling the attention of the superintendents and teachers to this service, which is specially appropriate as such a large number of teachers and scholars have joined the forces, and many of them have given their lives for their country. It is also to be hoped that the teachers and scholars will join in the collection for the British Red Cross Society on that day.—Yours, &c.,

SOLDIERS IN HOME CAMPS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your readers will be interested to learn that in response to the request for information respecting our Unitarian soldiers in Home Camps, I have already received several hundred names. I am anxious to begin the visits to the camps early in January; and I should be glad if further names could be kindly sent in to me at Essex Hall as soon as possible. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association desires to give practical effect to the suggestion that has been made; and I am therefore arranging to devote the necessary time to this special work during the next few months. Many men are still enlisting, and it will be a great help if the new names are sent to me as they are added to the Army Lists. When the names are received, I shall make arrangements for keeping in touch with the men.—Yours, &c.,

THOS. P. SPEDDING,
Missionary Agent.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE RIGHT HON. SIR HENRY ENFIELD ROSCOE, F.R.S.

IT is with a love passing speech that I venture to take up my pen to pay my tribute to the memory of one who was to me as an elder brother. As I do so, my mind goes back to the days when we were young together, sharing the same bedroom for twelve months at Heidelberg, and when the tie was knit that bound me to him to his dying day with an ever-growing affection. In 1853 Germany was not Bismarck's land of "blood and iron." It was the home of true Kultur, its people living a simple frugal life, breathing an atmosphere of sweetness and light, its universities visited by students from many lands to drink in its spirit of scientific research, as a very well spring of the latest knowledge of all things in earth and heaven, as they sat at the feet of the world's leaders of thought. It was at the age of 20 that Roscoe was drawn to the most famous school of chemistry in Europe and came, at a happy day for him and for chemical study in England, under the inspiring influence of the greatest chemist of his time, the celebrated Bunsen. His famous laboratory attracted students from many lands who were there baptised in his spirit. Of these, indeed, Roscoe has been among the foremost heirs to his genius, carrying on his great work. The Victorian Age gave birth to men who achieved great things in many spheres and not least in science; and Roscoe is to be singled out especially for what he accomplished in the very spirit of his own beloved master in establishing in new strength in Manchester a school of chemistry destined to send out from the Owens College a succession of students to fill in after life chairs of that noble science throughout the British Isles. So what was said of Sir Christopher Wren in St. Paul's: "Si monumentum quaeris, circumspice," could be said of Roscoe by all who beheld his handiwork in his pupils.

It was my privilege to be present at his Jubilee in the Whitworth Hall of the Manchester University; and it was one long testimony to the devoted affection borne to him by the students who owed to him their start upon careers of distinction throughout the country. Like the colonists of ancient Greece, who left their mother country carrying with them the sacred fire kindled at their native hearth, they went out from their Alma Mater in Roscoe's laboratory to diffuse its light in many a new centre. It was, in truth, a brave thing that the Council of the Owens College did when her fortunes were at their lowest ebb, in appointing Roscoe, a young man of only 24, to their Chair of Chemistry. He was as unknown as was Arnold when the governing body at Rugby selected that young private tutor to be their headmaster. The courage was rewarded in both cases. If Arnold revolutionised the public schools of England, Roscoe not only rejuvenated the Owens College and paved the way for its efflorescence into the University of Manchester, but also gave new life to the study of chemistry, in the north of England especially. In doing all this he accomplished a labour into which he threw his whole heart and soul. His laboratory was his beloved workshop. Thither pupils thronged to find in him more than a professor, a friend who descended from his chair to take a personal interest in them and to impart to them some of his own enthusiastic love of research, and to encourage them in its prosecution. It was the electric touch of his inspiring personality and of his great loving soul that won their very hearts and sent them anew to their task, after a word from him, like young giants refreshed. It was the compelling power of a man who believed with all that was within him in the thing he was doing that won Roscoe his magnetic influence.

He once said to me, later in life when he was in Parliament, that every evening, as he walked home from college, he felt that he had done something, but that, when he left the House of Commons late at night, he felt that what he had done was comparatively little. There was a touch of melancholy in his voice, rare to his cheery boyish nature, as he said it. What he was doing in Parliament was no longer the source of the enthusiastic and unalloyed joy and confidence that made his chemical chair the unique thing that it was in his life. It was the supreme and forceful vitality that he put into it which made him so compelling a power in Manchester. Men believed in him because without any loss of the native childlike simplicity and unconsciousness of self that was so great a charm in him, he believed in the thing to which he set his hand. It was because of that that Mr. Thomas Ashton, the great friend of many a noble cause in Manchester, unsurpassed as a judge of character, in his turn believed in him and the future of the college as a school of science, and set himself to find for it a new home in the Oxford Road in the fine buildings now occupied and enlarged by the University. In this great consummation we recognise accordingly the share borne by Roscoe in association with others bearing great and honoured names, such as Ashton, Greenwood, Ward, Hopkinson and many more too numerous to mention.

As is fully told in Roscoe's own delightful reminiscences, his life was one of ceaseless industry and manifold activity to the last, outside the more immediate labours of the great chemical school of which he was the main founder in Manchester. Little as he, in his native humility, was satisfied with his parliamentary achievements, he was yet representing at Westminster with watchful care the interests of science, just as on the Technical Education Commission he had done much to forward a cause so vital to the nation. As Vice-Chancellor of the University of London, and as Governor of Eton College he laboured in the promotion of University and public school education on the lines of the ideals to which he devoted his life. A very illuminating essay from his hand published in Germany contrasted German and English public school education, its judgment being that the former produced in larger degree men of learning and expert knowledge, and the latter men of character to become, in after life, leaders of their fellows in practical affairs, able to go out through the length and breadth of the British Empire as rulers of its various races with a success born of the knowledge of human nature gained in the companionships of their school days. Roscoe's pen, with admirable charm and simplicity in his Elementary Chemistry Manuals, won for them a vogue in languages that covered the civilised world, while his great work became a classic. In the world of science, he took a distinguished place from his own researches, collaborating in early days with Baum and Kirchhoff at Heidelberg.

In their famous investigations into spectrum analysis he was an indefatigable participant. One of his own immediate achievements was the discovery of banadium. He had the joy of the cry of "Eureka," the reward of the long patient labours of the scientific discoverer in the unveiling of one more of the secrets of the Universe. He won many honours. He was Fellow of the Royal Society, and he sat among his peers in all lands, occupying presidential chairs of the highest distinction, and filling them with all his own native energy and his happy genius for doing and saying the right thing. Fitting indeed it was that, in his own city of Manchester he should preside over the British Association. Further honours fell upon him in his knighthood and his Privy Councillorship, but none altered the simplicity of heart and life that made him one of Nature's gentlemen. He was indeed one of the people in heart and soul, inheriting in his surname of Roscoe and his Christian name of Enfield traditions of high culture richly fulfilled in himself, but of all his many labours none were more characteristic of his spirit and genius than the successful organisation of the science lectures for the people which did so much to attract them to the study of nature.

But, like all men of such high moral and intellectual vitality as Roscoe possessed, he was more than all his work. After his retirement from his chair, and during and after his parliamentary career, he was full of earnest activity in many a field, labouring in the cause of science, untiring to the last. He was the same man living and dying. Now, weaving with no trembling fingers the holly round the Christmas hearth, nay, rather with hearts singing a thanksgiving hymn for a life so fully lived and then passing on, rich to over-flowing in years and honours, so peacefully, we who loved him bear our witness to the beauty of the nature, to the illuminating power of the gifted mind of this dear companion of our lives, to the gay wisdom that, with a twinkle in his eye, fell from his lips, to the joyous soul within him endowing him with a perennial youth right away beyond his four score years, to the pure heart as of a little child that beat within his breast, to his soul that knew no guile, to the fund of affection that was in him, knitting him to us and us to him in bonds that neither time nor distance could sever and that death cannot break. Peace be to his memory, as I lay this poor little wreath of a lifelong affection upon his grave.

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

A memorial service was held on Wednesday, December 22, at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead. The Rev. Henry Gow officiated. The chief mourners were Miss Roscoe, Mrs. Enfield (sisters), Mr. and Mrs. Mallet (daughter and son-in-law), and Mr. Robin Roscoe (cousin). The Royal Society was represented by the president, Sir J. J. Thomson, Professor A. Schuster, Professor Smithells, and Sir E. Thorpe; the University of London by Sir Alfred Pearce Gould (vice-chancellor), Sir Thomas Barlow, Professor M. J. M. Hill (chairman of the Academic Council); University College by Dr. T. Gregory Foster (the provost); the Victoria University of Manchester by Sir Henry Miers (vice-chancellor) and Professor H. B. Dixon. Sir Boverton Redwood represented the Society of Chemical Industry. Among others present were Lord and Lady Bryce, Lord and Lady Courtney, Lord Ashton of Hyde, Viscount Iveagh, Colonel Addison, Lieut.-Colonel Arthur Crossley (Foreign Secretary of the Chemical Society), Mr. S. Smiles (secretary of the Chemical Society), Sir A. W. Ward (Master of Peterhouse) and Miss Ward, Dr. Glazebrook and Dr. Harker (representing the National Physical Laboratory), Professor Silvanus Thompson, Professor Sir J. Larmor, M.P., the Rev. H. E. and Mrs. Dowson, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, Lieutenant B. Darbishire, Mr. Edgar Worthington, the Rev. R. T. Hertford, the Rev. F. H. Jones, the Rev. J. Harwood, and Dr. John Hunter. The interment took place the next day at Brookwood cemetery. The Rev. H. Gow officiated at the grave side.

MRS. DE BRENT.

By the death of Mrs. Aileen de Brent, wife of Dr. Mortimer de Brent, of Clapham, and daughter of the late Rev. R. E. B. Maclellan, the sorrows of a wide circle of friends and co-workers have been deepened at this sorrowful time. In her early years she was happy in the affection of many, as she accompanied her esteemed father in his later pastorates, at Canterbury, Maidstone, and Chatham; and during the last thirty years she has been intimately connected with the Wandsworth congregation, promoting all its work with rare self-devotion, and ever faithful in attendance at worship. Her practical mind was bent, indeed, on serving the community to the full of her power; and for many years she was a staunch and energetic ally on local committees working for political and social advance, as well as in connection with the "Mabys" and C.O.S. A few years ago she had a severe illness, but recovered sufficiently to resume regular Sunday attendance, and to render efficient guidance to the Women's Congregational Society, of which she was president. Her death, at the age of 67, occurred on December 22; the interment, at Norwood on the 27th, was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Her husband and a son and daughter survive her.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

REPORT OF OPEN-AIR WORK IN 1915.

THE following is a summary of the report which has been drawn up by the Missionary Agent, the Rev. T. P. Spedding :—

In March last the Committee of the Association issued a circular inviting the co-operation of ministers in a scheme of Open-Air Meetings in place of the ordinary Van Mission meetings. The war made it difficult as well as inopportune to arrange Van Meetings in quite the same way as in former years. "To take some part in an effort to quicken the minds and hearts of our fellow-men with an inspiring and noble religious faith," said the circular, "is surely worthy of the best we Unitarians can give or do."

Over a hundred favourable replies were received, though many ministers intimated that they preferred special addresses in their churches rather than Open-Air Meetings. Considerable regret was expressed that the vans were not to be used, while, on the other hand, not a few ministers who have regularly taken part in the Mission replied that they did not see their way to take part in out-door meetings this season.

Most of the District Societies agreed that the work would be welcome in their areas, and some committees were appointed to carry out the arrangements usually in conjunction with the Missionary Agent.

The Van Mission supplied large quantities of literature for free distribution at the meetings; where required, posters and handbills were printed, the assistance of auxiliary speakers was provided, and in some instances a considerable portion of the expense was met.

The Missionary Agent combined his preaching engagements for the Association with the work of the Mission, and in this way was able to visit many parts of the country during the season. Special series of meetings were conducted in North-East Lancashire, in the Western Union District, and in South-East Wales. In the Sheffield district meetings were held in a number of places which the vans had visited on previous occasions. In Manchester, London, Stockton, Blackburn, Mountain Ash, regular weekly meetings were held during the summer, and in other centres shorter periods were arranged for, or the gatherings were held on consecutive evenings.

A van was used in Stepney, and some good meetings were held; but the experiment showed that it was only worth while using the vans where a fully organised tour could be undertaken.

Reports have been received of between two and three hundred meetings in various parts of the country, and in each case ministers speak with satisfaction of the effort.

The Missionary Agent's own experience is that, in some respects, the meetings have more nearly answered their intention than in any previous season. It should not be forgotten that the original object of the Mission was the promulgation of an affirmative faith. If the Unitarian interpretation of the religion of Jesus is good anywhere, it is good everywhere. The message that is delivered in the church with a view to human good does not lose its motive in the open air. Indeed, the out-of-doors preacher bears testimony to a keener realisation of essential truths in the presence of an unaccustomed audience. He cannot, of course, avoid controversy, should it arise; but he is not out for controversy. He is out to carry a religious message into places where the Church is unrepresented.

This summer, men's minds have been too full of other things to care much for theological discussion; but they are hungry, as never before in our time, for any bread of life that religion can offer them. For this reason questions have been fewer; and when they came they were usually helpful and not hostile.

The hope for the future is that the churches will realise that there is room for every agency that seeks to help mankind, and that the only worthy rivalry is that of service. The Mission finds its own justification there, and looks forward with confidence.

During the first three months of the year the Missionary Agent spent the week-ends at Coventry, where a revival of interest on the part of the congregation led to the settlement of the Rev. Leonard Short, and to plans that are producing excellent results. Subsequently the whole of the churches in the Northumberland and Durham district were visited, three weeks-ends were devoted to churches in the Nottingham district, extended visits were paid to North-East Lancashire, South-East Wales and the West of England. Between the beginning of April and the end of August preaching engagements on Sundays were fulfilled in seven London and twenty-four provincial churches. During the eight months to the end of August the Missionary Agent was away from London for over fifteen weeks, and, exclusive of Sundays and the Coventry engagements, he had over two hundred meetings, lectures, meetings with committees in various parts of the country on behalf of the Mission and the Association.

The Report should not close without a word of grateful acknowledgment to the many friends of the Van Mission whose donations have enabled the work to be carried on. Through their generosity the difficulties and anxieties of a trying year have been largely overcome, and it is hoped that the further help which is needed to ensure that the work shall be completed without any demand this year upon the funds of the Association will be forthcoming.

THE address delivered by Prof. Gilbert Murray on 'Ethical Problems of the War,' which appeared in our issue of October 30, has been published in pamphlet form by Messrs. Thomas Nelson & Sons, of Paternoster Row. As will be seen in our advertisement columns quantities for distribution can be obtained at special rates on application to the Rev. James Harwood, Secretary of the National Conference, at 60, Howitt Road, Hampstead. The object is to promote the wide circulation which the address so well deserves, and the price charged will simply cover expenses.

WE have received a copy of The Lay Preachers' Handbook for 1916, issued by the National Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union (London, Essex Hall, 3*d*. net). It contains particulars of the various local unions which are included in the national society and the names and addresses of their members. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., contributes an introduction, and there are short articles by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, Dr. A. D. Tyssen and the Rev. T. P. Spedding. A list of ministers, who are willing to assist lay preachers in the preparation of sermons, has been drawn up, and there are some useful hints about courses of reading. Altogether this modest handbook has made a promising start and has been arranged on thoroughly practical lines. The secretary of the National Union is Miss Francis, 128, Broadwall, S.E.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Burnley.—On Saturday, December 18, a one day Sale of Work was held in the schoolroom of Trafalgar Street Church. It was hoped to raise enough to pay for certain necessary repairs and alterations, amounting to £25 or £30, and to have a little to hand over to the general fund. The result was over £107. Mr. J. T. Bibby, Vice-President of the church and Superintendent of the school, opened the sale, whilst Mr. W. Fairhurst occupied the chair.

Bury.—In his New Year's letter to the members of Bank Street Chapel and Sunday School published in the January Calendar, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans writes as follows:—"As to our own special congregational work, it has been largely absorbed in war work. The Women's League again has done excellently in their untiring work of sewing and knitting, and have sent large consignments of made-up articles of clothing to various parts where the need has been known, mainly to the hospitals in the South of France, and to the Belgian Hospitals, which latter the Unitarians of this country, through the leadership of Mrs. Bernard Allen and the Editor of THE INQUIRER, have made their special charge. Since the dire need of the Belgian hospitals was discovered the efforts to meet them have been untiring and marvellously satisfactory. I am glad the visit of the Editor of THE INQUIRER to Bury was so gratifying in the fruits it bore here. The collection was 'excellent,' as he described it, and this, together with a handsome donation from a member of the congregation, made his visit, I am sure, very gratifying to himself as well as to us. Our collections for the Red Cross and kindred Societies have also been splendid, and personally, therefore, all this willing and eager service has been unfeigned pleasure. And those young men, and some elderly as well, seventy-three of them from our church and schools, who have offered their all to their country's good, I have no words that can adequately express my feeling for them. Three of them have already made the supreme sacrifice — Frederick Hardman, Hubert Taylor, and Joseph Taylor—and I can only stand before them all in dumb admiration, nay, in affectionate wonderment and awe. God bless all of them who are still living, and may he bring them back safely to our hearts."

Glasgow.—The Rev. L. Jenkins Jones has announced his acceptance of the unanimous call given to him by the St. Vincent Street Unitarian Church, and will commence his ministry on Sunday, January 16. Mr. Jones was formerly minister of the Unitarian Church at Woolwich, in which place he took an active part in public affairs. On leaving Woolwich Mr. Jones was engaged on educational and organisation work for upwards of a year, and thought of withdrawing from the ministry. He discovered, however, that his real interest and heart lay in the work of the ministry, and Glasgow has been fortunate in securing his services.

Hackney.—The Sale of Work held on December 17 and 18 proved a great success. It was opened on the Friday afternoon by Mrs. Walter Baily, Dr. Charles Hargrove, M.A. D.Litt., in the chair. Amongst the "side shows" were two khaki crates, one for the Belgian Hospital Fund, the other for men on the Roll of Honour; to each of the men was sent a small parcel of suitable articles. As a result of the sale a sum of £95 was handed to the Treasurer (Mr. J. S. Harding, 40, Darenth Road, Stamford Hill, N.), who will be glad to acknowledge any further donations sent to him. The Building Debt is now reduced to £129.

Liverpool, Boys' Own Brigade.—The following account of the B.O.B. appears in the Ullet Road Church Calendar for January:—"The printed report of the B.O.B (Liverpool Battalion, October 1, 1914, to September 30, 1915), has recently been issued. It is gratifying to find that though there has been a shortage of officers in consequence of army recruiting, and a consequent shrinking of activities, the few officers who have been forced to remain at home have thrown their best energies into the work, and have kept their respective Companies in a state of good proficiency. There are four Companies in the Liverpool Battalion, viz.—Mill Street, Hamilton Road, Bootle and Birkenhead. Fifty-three former members are now serving in His Majesty's forces, of whom twenty-eight are officers or N.C.O.'s. It is sad to state that death has already claimed four members. In former years a Summer Camp in the Isle of Man has proved the most attractive feature in the whole twelve months, but this summer it was found to be impracticable owing to the scarcity of officers and the inability of the few remaining in Liverpool to leave home when wanted. Mr. Norman Hall has succeeded his brother, Mr. Lawrence Hall, in the post of Hon. Secretary."

Nantwich.—A successful children's concert was held at the Old Presbyterian (Unitarian) Chapel on December 15. Part of the programme was repeated on the 21st at an entertainment for wounded soldiers. About fifty men were present from the three local Red Cross Hospitals. A hearty welcome to the guests was given by the Rev. J. Park Davies, and Private J. Brown replied.

Northampton.—At the meeting on December 12, Mrs. West read a report of the working of the War Benevolent Fund in connection with Kettering Road Church during its first year, and Mr. Sale presented a financial statement. It was shown that members and friends had contributed in donations and weekly subscriptions the sum of £138, which had been expended in the maintenance of a bed in the Allies Hospital at Yvetot, and in grants to the Commission for Relief in Belgium, the Serbian Relief Fund, the Red Cross Society, and several other philanthropic agencies. A grant has since been made to the Armenian Relief Fund. This effort to succour the distressed is one of the best pieces of work we are doing, says the Calendar, at present, and we are glad and proud that it has received and continues to receive such excellent support. The Officers and Committee were thanked for their services, and re-elected: President, the Rev. W. C. Hall; Secretary, Mrs. West; Treasurer, Mr. J. Sale.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LAST OF THE PRE-RAPHAELITE PAINTERS.

Mr. Arthur Hughes, who has just died at the pleasant house at Kew which he inherited, it is said, from a childless couple who admired his work, was the last of the Pre-Raphaelite painters. He was never an actual member of the Brotherhood, but he sympathised entirely with its aims, and was intimately associated with the men who, between sixty and seventy years ago, wrought such changes in English art. At the early age of 15 he was admitted to the Royal Academy Schools, where Millais and Holman Hunt, who were recent students, and five or six years older than himself, quickly recognised his remarkable ability. He was only 17 when his first picture was hung in the Academy, and three years later his 'Ophelia' was exhibited along with Millais's 'Ophelia' and 'The Huguenot,' and 'The Hireling Shepherd,' by Holman Hunt. Hughes was the model for Millais's 'Prescribed Royalist,' which was painted about this time, and his portrait also figures in almost all Rossetti's illustrations to Tennyson, for he rented a sunny room in Rossetti's house in Cheyne Walk, says a fellow-artist, in order to paint the shadows in his picture of 'The Long Engagement,' now at Birmingham, and, by all accounts, got so little of his own work done that he had to remove and finish the picture elsewhere. Hughes was the first illustrator of 'Tom Brown's Schooldays'; he also illustrated the poems of George MacDonald, William Allingham, and Christina Rossetti, and took part in the mural decoration—now perished—of the Union Society's Hall at Oxford. He was a delightful man to meet, full of reminiscences of the notable men whom he had known, but remarkably modest about his own work, and eager to discover talent in others. It is said that he was quite overwhelmed by the exhibition of his pictures in the Whitechapel Art Gallery in 1905, and withdrew several of them in order that the work of others might be better seen.

THE FIRST COOKERY BOOK.

Two editions of what is believed to be the first printed cookery book, namely Bartholomæus Platina (i.e., B. Sacchi), 'De Honesta Voluptate et Valetudine,' Venice, 1475, have been lent to the London Library by Mr. G. R. Redgrave. The older of the two editions, says The Times, is, in spite of its great age, a pleasing book to handle, its generously wide margins, its rich ink, its good type, and uncrippled back making it easy to decipher. It is a peculiar feature of the older cookery books that they dabble a good deal in medicine. Sacchi, it appears, says not a word about cookery in his early chapters until he has told in terse Latin, which has many businesslike abbreviations, how the body may be made fit by proper exercise. The table and its decorations are dealt with, flowers as well as silver and gleaming cutlery being considered requisite, though only, apparently, because "these things excite the appetite," and not because they gratify the eye. Food, he says, should be enjoyed, in winter, within shut doors in a warm temperature, but in the summer we are advised to partake of it in the open air. There are few dishes left unmentioned, and among the vegetables enumerated are several that we have only lately begun to use in our salads.

REFUGEE STUDENTS AT OXFORD.

In a report issued at Oxford University by the Committee on Junior Refugee Students, it is stated that of the thirty-one junior refugee students in residence in March last the great majority had left Oxford for military or other public service, and only seven now remain. Four of these are employed in teaching at the Belgian School at St. John's College; the other three are pursuing their studies in science and mathematics. All are either ex-soldiers who have been dispensed with from service by authority or are well below the military age. During the last Long Vacation the Committee were able to arrange for students to be accommodated away from Oxford, and they hope to be able to make similar arrangements for most of them during the coming vacation. The Committee have received during the nine months now reported on no complaint of any kind with regard to the students.

SERBIAN CHRISTMAS RITES.

The curious rites which are celebrated at Christmastide in Serbian households are obviously connected with Pagan worship, and the divinity of the Sun, though it is Christ's name that is mentioned in connection with them. Monsieur W. M. Petrovitch, himself a Serb, has an article in The Times on this subject to which pathetic interest attaches on account of the homeless and destitute condition of many thousands of his fellow-countrymen at the present moment. A great deal is made of the lighting of the Badgnak, or young oak tree, which evidently corresponds to the Yule Log of merry England in olden times, and at supper, on Christmas Eve, when no meat is served, the father of the family enthusiastically toasts the Badgnak, pouring red wine over the protruding end of the burning timber. During Christmas morning there is always a visitor (polaznik) generally a young boy from a neighbouring house. When he enters he breaks off a small branch of the Badgnak's smouldering end, greeting the head of the house with "Christ is born," to which all the others reply, "In truth He is born!" the mother throwing at him a handful of wheat. He then approaches the hearth and strikes the Badgnak with his own piece of tree repeatedly, so that thousands of sparks fly up into the chimney, and he pronounces his good wishes somewhat like this:—"May the holy Christmas bring to this house as many sheep, as many horses, as many cows, as many beehives (and so forth) . . . as there are sparks in this fire!" Then he places on the Badgnak either a silver or a gold coin which the head of the family keeps to give to the blacksmith to smelt in with the steel when making his new plough—for, as he believes, this cannot fail to make the ground more fertile and all go well.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

EXACTLY a year ago, in our issue for January 9, 1915, a letter appeared from the pen of Mrs. Bernard Allen asking our readers for help for the Belgian hospitals. On the same day we endorsed the appeal and pleaded that this was a piece of work to which we could set our hands. We closed our leading article with the following words: "It is in our power to make [the Belgian soldier] and his comrades rich men, rich in the knowledge that across the seas there are people who care while they suffer, and will do much to ease their pain and to cure them of their wounds, and to send them forth with new heart to fight again for their country. Who will give? Who will give quickly?"

AT first we cherished only modest hopes and there was little thought of a permanent organisation with a wide field of operations. On January 16 we published the first list of contributions amounting to £161 14*s.* and a small list of parcels. To-day the list stands at over £10,000, and the gifts received in kind have almost overwhelmed us in their amount and variety. To commemorate this achievement Mrs. Allen has written a special article on the work of the year, which appears to-day. To many of our readers the facts will be familiar already, for we have been careful to keep them in close touch week by week with what we were doing; but a summary of this kind will help them to realise the range and usefulness of the activities in which they have taken such a generous interest. We have accomplished much. It is an incentive to go on and do still more so long as the war lasts and we can render this friendly service to our brave Allies.

UNDOUBTEDLY the success of the Fund has been largely due to the way in which our readers have been enabled to take a personal interest in the work from the beginning. Mrs. Allen's articles have been a special feature during the past year. Written out of actual experience and with a telling simplicity of style they have helped our contributors to follow their gifts into the hospitals, and almost to see the welcome with which they have been received. Mr. Kelland's constant reports to us from the field of operations in France have also supplied many telling paragraphs. Everything has had in it this sense of actuality and intelligent sympathy. We are not unmindful of the benefit which has come to our own pages in this way. It has put flesh and blood into them and a passionate human interest, and helped us to link all the topics which usually occupy our attention with the absorbing duties of the hour. We have done our best to mobilise our forces of sympathy and charity, and to direct them into channels where their gifts of healing are urgently needed.

OF course it has meant incessant labour and a great deal of travelling. Mrs. Allen has been in France six times. Mr. Kelland is always on the road and spends more time on the other side of the Channel than at home. The editor has paid three visits of absorbing interest to various parts of France in order to see the work with his own eyes. Faithful stewards, who have received the entire confidence of a generous public, could do no less. Without this personal touch the efficiency of the work would have suffered and the delightful element of human friendship would have been lacking. As we look back upon it we are conscious that our opportunities have been rich beyond those of most people. We have seen the grim realities of the war at close quarters. We have learned much from these brave men, and done our best to make their wounds and loneliness and their intolerable sufferings part of our own lives.

THERE has been an exchange of New Year greetings among the Allies. Though they have about them the touch of formality inseparable from compliments, they all breathe a spirit of stern resolve, and unshaken confidence. The true reason for this union of hearts may not strike the superficial observer. There is a sense that the impalpable things for which we are fighting, the vindication of justice and the defence of right, transcend the material interests of any single nation. If we could define our aims in terms of political ambition or territorial conquest, elements of conflicting interest might easily arise. But the dangers of division disappear when we have to protect ourselves from a common menace to freedom and national security. Germany has enlisted the soul of mighty peoples against her. Slowly and at bitter cost to herself she is learning the strength of a moral alliance.

THE New Year has been marked by many messages from our religious leaders. Some of them have been little more than common-place attempts to improve the occasion. Others expressed in conventional theological language about sin and judgment leave us cold. The Archbishop of York, in the message which he has issued to his diocese, takes higher ground, and speaks with the simplicity and directness which are the proper language of vital religion. After pleading for the spirit which steadily faces the facts as they are, meets them, refuses to be daunted by them, and resolves to overcome them, he points out that fortitude needs strength to sustain it.

> There is [he says] only one ultimate source of moral and spiritual strength. It is God. But we shall get no strength even from God if we only seek it in order that we may win the war. There is a way of thinking, speaking, even praying, common, it seems, among our enemies, but not unknown among ourselves, which regards the Most High God as if He were some great ally in reserve, whose power may be by our entreaties "mobilised" for our advantage. There is no hope of moral and spiritual strength in such an attitude of mind. Strength to bear itself aright in this crisis, unspeakably solemn, of its history, strength to fulfil the purpose of God, will come to the nation through conversion—the turning of its mind and will—to God as revealed in Jesus Christ. This conversion will have, as always, two movements, the offer of repentance and the desire of renewal. We must turn away in shame and sorrow of heart from all the unreal and conventional Christianity, the care for things material, the indifference to things spiritual, the selfishness and self-assertion, which are being judged in this outbreak of war.

THE publication of Lord Derby's report on Tuesday has put an end to the uncertainty in which some of the newspapers have found such a rich opportunity for a campaign of conjectural criticism, suspicion and innuendo during the past ten days. They would have shown a much nobler patriotism if they had not pretended to have a great deal of private information about Cabinet secrets and personal intrigues, and had realised their duty to present a grave national issue in such a way that sensible men can discuss it without personal bitterness and all the rhodomontade about treachery and base political motives, which is so often made to do duty for the hard tasks of thought. The question of compulsory military service is one which we must all be prepared to face as a fresh issue. It cannot be dismissed à priori as wicked or unjust. Our attitude towards it, even if we reject it as unwise, must be governed by the consideration that we are engaged in the biggest and most dangerous war in history. Nor must we forget in the heat of arguments that many of the wisest men in the country support it at the present moment because they are for liberty and not against it.

Two things stand out quite clearly from the mass of figures in Lord Derby's report. The first is the splendid patriotism of the volunteers. No people has ever done anything like it before. Without any legal obligation we have created such a healthy public opinion, and it has worked with such strong moral pressure, that our young men have relinquished their private aims for public duty and banded themselves together into an exceeding great army. Nothing can tarnish their honour or cause the glory of their deed to grow pale. The second is the failure of a sufficient number of unmarried men of military age to attest to make it possible to keep faith with the married recruits unless some means is found of bringing them in. We are not going to join in the dangerous game of juggling with statistics. Whether we like it or not, and for ourselves we deeply deplore and regret it, we cannot explain away a figure like 650,000 and make it negligible. It is all pure conjecture how many of these men have valid excuses. We shall know when they have been attested and their requests for relief have been properly examined, and we cannot know before.

THE speech of the Prime Minister on Wednesday was largely based upon these considerations. He was bound to redeem his pledge. There would not have been a remnant of respect for him as an honest man, if he had done anything else, and our reputation for political honour would have received a mortal wound. It is not now a question whether the pledge was wise or not. It certainly had a large backing from public opinion, and it is the belief of those who are in the best position to form an accurate judgment that it was an important element in the success of Lord Derby's campaign. Such being the plain facts only two courses are possible for the country. If Mr. Asquith and his government are to remain in office the pledge must be redeemed, and the Bill which was introduced into the House of Commons on Wednesday is the only possible policy. Otherwise the government must go; all our recruiting arrangements must be thrown back into chaos; and we must accept the terrible danger which will arise from a weakening of our prestige with our Allies;—and all this in face of Lord Kitchener's plain statement that "in the special circumstances of this utterly unprecedented struggle, the existing system without modification is not equal to maintaining the Army which is needed to secure victory."

WE hope that many people will read Mr. Asquith's speech without note or comment or the confused clamour of debate in their ears. What strikes us about it is its complete honesty of purpose, its moderation of tone and the absence of anything like harshness or reproof. Running through it there is a strong undercurrent of sympathy with the young manhood of England and an earnest desire to meet all genuine cases of difficulty. There is no intention to penalise the defaulter by making him a marked man; the possibility of enrolment under the group system is to be kept open till the Bill becomes law; and the proposed exemptions are generous.

WE particularly welcome Mr. Asquith's treatment of the case of the conscientious objector; though it is exactly what we had every reason to expect from a man of his Nonconformist ancestry and robust commonsense. We quote the passage in full:—

> Those of us who know the real facts of British life know quite well that there are many people belonging to various religious denominations and to various schools of thought who are quite prepared to serve their country in the war but who object on conscientious grounds to the taking of life. But there are many other military duties they are ready to perform and capable of performing. I know myself of many cases in which, for instance, men who hold these tenets, and hold them tenaciously as well as conscientiously, have gone out on minesweepers and have undertaken a number of ancillary duties which are very important to the successful prosecution of the war, with the very best results, and have exhibited the greatest bravery and courage and exposed themselves to the same risks as those who go into the trenches and shoot off guns. It is suggested in the case of such people that the exemption which they should get—and which I am certain is all that they would claim—is, in the case of an application on conscientious grounds, to take the form of a certificate of exemption from combatant military duty only. There is no difficulty whatsoever for a man, after he has obtained a certificate of that kind, just as effectively to discharge the duties of a citizen for military purposes within the limits of his own conscientious scruples as the man who undertakes military duties in the fullest sense of the term.

These are not the words of a ruthless violator of conscience. They breathe a spirit of delicate respect for the high-minded scruples of men who cannot see eye to eye with himself. In their simplicity and restraint they show a sounder appreciation of moral facts than much of the over-heated language about conscientiousness. They are all the more impressive when we remember that they are the words of a man who carries the burden of empire on his shoulders, the leader no longer of a political party but of our whole people in their struggle for existence.

FRESHNESS OF MIND.

WE know that in many quarters obstinacy in sticking to our own opinions is considered to be a virtue. The man who pursues his own course, regardless of the advice of his friends and the shocks of changing circumstance, is praised for his firm principles. To change our mind, to modify our formulas, to learn from experience to the extent of exploring a new situation apart from the prejudices of our own party or tradition, all this is condemned by many people as weakness of character. But is it reasonable or just to do so? The wooden mind, which never bends and never yields, has its use in a world of settled routine. It plods along the beaten tracks. It performs the conventional duties. It makes the conventional protests. You can count on it to say what it has always said and do what it has always done. But what place has it in a world that is suddenly alive with new vision and electric with unfamiliar passions?

There are days when our own life, or the life of the nation of which we form so intimate a part, is carried far out to sea. We wrestle at close quarters with the tempest and the waves. Our safety depends upon sharpness of vision and quickness of instinct, or complete obedience to one who has more gift for command than ourselves. To argue, to hesitate, to quarrel about the rights and limits of leadership, is to court disaster. We take with us into such scenes our trained intelligence, our habits of generosity and self-control, and the thought of God in our hearts. They shield us from selfish concern for ourselves and the crimes of cowardice, and help us at the trying moment to be worthy of whatever has been good in our own past. But the watchwords of sect and party, the hundred familiar claims for personal freedom and consideration, they have no place in this sharp contest for security. The mind, freshened into new vitality by the keen breath of danger and the certainty that others depend upon us for their deliverance, works with unwonted strength and simplicity. It has become flexible to the teaching of experience and the tragic need of the hour.

As a people we have been plunged into darkness and tempest. The familiar landscape has been blotted out. New duties face us on every side. Strange questions press for an answer. Problems, which have never come our way before, give us no rest until we solve them. We never stood in greater need of the reserves of character and the strength which comes from close fellowship with the power and justice of God. But we need almost as much the freshness of mind which will save us from the disasters of intellectual obstinacy, and make us sensitive to the danger of limiting our actions by the decisions and watchwords of the past. The man who still thinks exactly as he thought two years ago only reveals his own incapacity for receiving and using new experience.

Our political leaders have been pleading for this freshness and adaptability of mind with the leaders of labour for months past. Whatever virtues Trade Union rules may possess in ordinary times, it is clear that they cannot be applied with rigour during a great war without courting disaster. When the need is for a maximum output in the shortest possible time, and the ranks of the skilled workers have been depleted in order to keep a vast army in the field, restrictions must be removed, new experiments must be tried, and all disputes which weaken energy must be postponed to a brighter day. It is not surprising that trade unionists failed to see this at first. They tried the dangerous experiment of enforcing the old rules in face of the new conditions. But this recourse to the familiar weapons of industrial strife was so clearly unintelligent that the abler minds among them have yielded upon point after point. They have agreed to the employment of women and the dilution of the skilled trades with unskilled labour and other matters which are contrary to all precedent and reduce many familiar arguments to confusion. They have done this not simply because they have been chastened by the terror of the war. They have felt that influence, no doubt, as we all have done. But they have also had the courage to lay aside many prejudices, to dismiss ready-made solutions, and to acknowledge that an overwhelming need, placed right in the midst of our common life, calls above all things for courage and sacrifice and freshness of mind.

All sensible men and women will desire to approach the burning question of compulsion for military service in a similar temper. Unfortunately it is a matter which has a long record of party strife behind it and is still associated for many of us with feelings which quickly boil over into anger. It is fatally easy to plunge into party wrangles, in which we unsheathe all the old weapons, and spend long and weary hours of debate, without advancing one inch nearer to a solution of the real problem which confronts us. Now we are not so blind or so conceited as to imagine that everybody who faces the present situation with freshness of mind will agree with our own attitude, but we are persuaded that a little genuine thinking will do much to remove bitterness and possible disunion. First, it will help us to see this particular question of policy in relation to the larger issues of which it forms a part. Its importance is not primary, but secondary. What matters supremely is that we should win in the war, not for the sake of a glorious victory for our arms, but because victory has in it the promise of priceless benefits which can be obtained in no other way. It is hard to conceive that any man of alert intelligence can plead that it is right for us to win the war with a colossal army of volunteers, but that we ought to face the possibility of irretrievable disaster rather than impose military service as a legal obligation upon any man. The question is thus for the vast majority of us one not of ultimate moral principle but of political judgment. Complete agreement is unlikely, but we can disagree without bitterness, feeling beneath our difference the constraining bond of complete union in the ends for which we fight. Second, a healthy freshness of mind will save us from the futility of merely repeating many of the old watchwords and the folly of supposing that rhetoric can take the place of thought. We can only give one illustration of our meaning. To speak of the introduction of any form of compulsory service as a surrender to the methods of Prussia, forgetful that France with her army of conscript citizens preserves a high standard of democratic freedom, is simply a lapse into abuse as faulty in taste as it is feeble in intelligence. Thirdly, whatever his conclusion may be the wise man will be anxious to arrive at it along fresh paths of thought. It is not sufficient to give the old obstinate reply, "it is against my conscience." The effect of such a verdict upon other minds at the present moment is less than nothing, unless it is backed by reasons which can be weighed and accepted. Have we, for instance, adequate reasons for regarding compulsion for military service as a crime against personal liberty, when we accept compulsory education, compulsory payment of taxes, compulsory service on juries, and many other obligations imposed by the public will, without a murmur about their injustice? Can we say, not as a matter of academic debate, but as we stand now face to face with the most terrible menace that can threaten a nation, that the State has a right to extort our money but may not command our service for the protection of our shores, the defence of our liberties, and the fulfilment of all our obligations to our Allies?

Some of our readers will probably wish to discuss these questions and the position in regard to them which we ourselves feel bound to adopt. May we suggest to any possible correspondents that there can only be profit in such a discussion if we determine to explore the whole problem as a fresh issue, in its practical relation to the actual menace of the war, without resort to rhetorical commonplace or the heat which is engendered by party cries. For ourselves we have no desire to belittle protests or to ignore conscientious objections. Only let the protesting conscience be modest and tactful in its claims, remembering how much it asks from men who are wrought to the highest pitch of determination in a sacred cause, while we on our part accord it "all the favour which may be consistent with the public peace and security."

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Thee, Father, first they sung, Omnipotent,
Immutable, Immortal, Infinite,
Eternal King; thee, Author of all being,
Fountain of light, thyself invisible
Amidst the glorious brightness where thou sitt'st
Throned inaccessible, but when thou shad'st
The full blaze of thy beams, and through a cloud
Drawn round about thee like a radiant shrine
Dark with excessive bright thy skirts appear,
Yet dazzle Heaven, that brightest Seraphim
Approach not, but with both wings veil their eyes.

MILTON.

NATIONAL UNITY.

THIS moral function, fundamental to all States, is never perfectly discharged by any. Each has its own richer vein of character, its special sense of obligation, and clears on some one side the manifold ideal of human life. This characteristic is its particular trust, to be protected by all just means; and the subsidiary affections that cluster round it, the natural ties of place and language, the heritage of historic admirations, the appeal of native poetry and music, are its living supports—the bodyguard of Immortals that ward off encroachment on the kingly genius of a Nation. This service is their justification and their glory. But for their perpetual play around the heart, no durable life, no determinate physiognomy, could belong to any human society. And the men who affect to be above them, who are too cosmopolitan to care for anything at home, who are critics and censors of all that is near them while taken by some alien fascination,—do they show any more comprehensive wisdom, or higher affection? Is not their disclaimer of a narrow prejudice of the heart usually the result of a narrower in the understanding? There is in truth a great responsibility on those who, in public life, put themselves out of congeniality with the native Spirit and past development of their country. And there is a great and worthy service rendered by one who, personating the better characteristics of a people, and assuming the work they can best achieve, consolidates their life, and suspends the forces that would else divide them.... The Unity of a people, when at last attained by innumerable efforts, and the struggles of a protracted history, is a grand and sublime result,—the noblest fruit which the experience of ages can ripen; and whoever contributes to it should be admitted freely to his place of historic honour among the benefactors of his time. JAMES MARTINEAU.

O THOU, who knowest our hearts, and who seest our temptations and struggles, have pity upon us, and deliver us from the sins which make war upon our souls. Thou art all-powerful, and we are weak and erring. Our trust is in thee, O thou faithful God. Deliver us from the bondage of evil, and grant that we may hereafter be thy devoted servants, serving thee in the freedom of holy love. AMEN.

THE BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

A YEAR'S WORK.

EXACTLY a year has now passed since this Fund was inaugurated on January 9, 1915, in THE INQUIRER, and I think subscribers will like to have a summary of what has been accomplished by the aid of the money and gifts in kind which have been so generously given. When we began we had no idea how this work would develop, and this constant development has, no doubt, been one of the reasons why the interest has kept up so well. Our method of keeping constantly in close touch with all the organisations we aid gives us the opportunity of discovering many wants which would otherwise be overlooked. Numerous instances might be given: last week we came across a doctor with a poste de secours on a quay where a very large number of Belgians are always working. He was very poorly provided with necessaries. A very small outlay fitted up his hut with all that was wanted to enable him to look after the many little accidents which were brought in to him. We have always tried to keep an open heart for any work which no one else was doing and which needed to be done, whether for the soldiers or for civilians, and our friends here in England have loyally supported us in every fresh development, and the funds and material have always come in time. We hope to continue as long as we are needed, which, as far as we can see at present, will be until the Belgians are settled back in peace in their own country.

The work in the military hospitals has the first claim on our help and sympathy, because the men are, equally with the civilians, refugees from their homes, and in addition have given their blood for their country. But for the civilian women and children and old people our hearts are full of pity and desire to help, and whenever the chance has occurred we have not neglected it. The after care of men invalided out of the army and with no homes, and also the problem of their occupation and amusement in the camps where they are congregated, has interested us greatly.

Origin and Scope of the Fund.

This Fund was started in January, 1915, in response to an appeal which I made, after my visit to France, for help for the Belgian military hospitals in Calais and nearer the front.

These hospitals came into existence during the autumn of 1914 to meet the great need for accommodation for the Belgian wounded when they were turned out of their own country. There had, however, never been enough money to provide them with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed linen and clothing for the patients. All are reasonably well provided with these things now, and only need their store replenishing from month to month.

It is one of the greatest pleasures we have had to go round these hospitals now and contrast them with their state a year ago. Then they were lacking everything, except beds; they had not bed linen to go round, not enough blankets, no proper supply of instruments and very little store of clothing. Now each man is sure of sufficient comfort, all the help that skill can give him and a good outfit of clothes when he leaves.

In June, 1915, the scope of the Fund was enlarged by the inclusion of the Belgian base hospitals in the west of France, of which there are nearly forty. They lie in remote places, where visitors are rare and gifts rarer still, and they had many needs which we were glad to supply.

Subsequently, in October, we made a tour among the convalescent depots of the Belgian army in France, where the men are sent after discharge from hospital and before their return to the front. These places are peculiarly sad and make a special appeal to our sympathy; for it is only because these men have lost their homes and country that they are needed. We found many of them sadly lacking in the most essential comforts, and a great field of usefulness was opened up in this direction. Advantage has also been taken of any opportunity that offered to help in work among Belgian civilians both in Flanders and in France.

Method of Work.

Every one of the 101 hospitals and convalescent depots which we have aided (except six remote ones) has been visited by us, and those in the Calais district visited constantly. By this means those engaged in administering the Fund have gained personal knowledge of the individual needs of each hospital and are thus able to give the special help needed, whatever that may be, whether in the form of instruments, beds, linen or clothing. In every case the aim is to enable the Belgian doctors and nurses to carry on their work for their own people in their own way, without being hampered by the lack of the necessary equipment. In the case of the convalescent depots seven hundred beds with bedding have been sent out, besides games, a piano, bath chairs, musical instruments and handicrafts of various sorts.

In addition to the hospitals twenty-nine doctors serving at the front have been supplied with outfits of instruments and dressings for First Aid.

Civilian Work.

Considerable help has been sent to a maternity home in Flanders, and a hospice, also in Flanders, was supported for six months. This cost us £50 a month, and besides the money we sent many hundreds of garments.

We are now maintaining a small hospice for twenty-five beds in Calais, also for refugees, which is under the direction of Mme. Lageot, who is responsible on her own initiative for the starting and successful carrying on of a school for 170 refugee children.

Three motors have been sent out—one for the use of the maternity home; one for general refugee work in Flanders, and one for work in Calais.

Extent of the Fund's Work.

Since the first appeal was issued on January 9, 1915, £10,000 has been subscribed by 1,463 individuals or churches and societies, who have sent in 2,574 subscriptions. This gives an average of nearly £200 a week through the year. Many of the contributions have been the result of church collections and these represent a much larger number of subscribers than appears from the figures. The subscriptions have come from all over the world—America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Hong Kong, Trinidad, &c.—besides all parts of the British Isles.

In addition to the money, 62,276 articles of clothing and hospital requisites have been received as gifts from 1,089 different societies and private donors, in 2,321 parcels. This gives an average of about 45 parcels or about 1,200 articles a week. Some of these gifts have been of a very valuable nature—such as a piano, bath chairs, microscope, cases of invalid foods, bedsteads cases of surgical instruments, &c. During the first few months a good deal of clothing was bought, as the need was very urgent, but since then, owing to the large and generous parcels sent in by working parties connected with the Women's League, &c., and by private donors, it has not been necessary to spend much under this head. In all, 76,107 articles have been forwarded abroad, besides hundreds of beds, outfits for several operating theatres, and thousands of surgical instruments and hospital requisites. These have been distributed among the 101 Belgian hospital and convalescent depots. The chief expenditure has naturally been on such things as surgical instruments and beds. Great care has throughout been taken that only things really needed for the welfare of the patients are sent, and in speaking of the welfare of the patients, we mean their mental and moral as well as their physical well being. Anything that tends to ameliorate their condition in any of these respects we have considered within the scope of our work.

Transport and Administration.

After the first few months, all transport has been free, both on the trains and on the boats, owing to the kindness of the Belgian military authorities, but we have not quite eliminated all expense under this head, as there are certain small charges in connection with the distribution of the goods on the other side of the Channel.

The distribution of goods from Calais is entirely undertaken by Mr. W. W. Kelland, who spends most of his time in France on work for this Fund, and we owe much to his great business abilities and intimate knowledge of French life, which has enabled him to establish the most sympathetic relations with the hospitals with which we are connected.

There are no expenses for offices, administration, postage, printing, &c. all these being met from private sources.

ROSE ALLEN.

THE RETURN TO THE SUPERNATURAL.

SEATED opposite to me in a road motor-'bus, a few months ago, was a benevolent country vicar, and we were soon engaged in an animated discussion. At one point a gleam of savage satisfaction flashed vindictively in the eyes of the mild old man as he said, "one good thing the war has done already; it has killed your made-in-Germany higher criticism." Germany provides an excellent whipping-post for ideas we dislike. Show that your detested heresy originated there, then slay it and bathe your hands in its blood.

I notice that my fellow country-man, Principal E. Griffith-Jones, has been telling an interviewer: "It is no accident that the home of naturalism is to be found in Germany. German criticism has eliminated super-naturalism." Everybody is doing it. The worst of it, for me, is that I agree with some of the conclusions but not with the methods of such controversy. Unfortunately naturalism is not peculiarly German. Naturalism dominates especially the half-educated mind. The ignorant may be superstitious; our most modern philosophers may be supernaturalists; but your well-read, subscription-library person is nearly always anti-supernaturalist.

Now the chief trouble with naturalism is its protean character. The champion of it will tell you he does not mean by it materialism, or a mechanical "block" universe or even an absolutist Monism or, indeed, any one particular thing you are attacking. Use another word and he will admit the Supernatural quite freely.

CONDUCT AND THE SUPERNATURAL. By L. S. Thornton. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

Ask him whether he believes in a real communion of the soul with God, spirit with spirit; in a God of grace who brings to man a new access of strength to lift burdens, a redeeming love and holiness to forgive sins and purify the heart and he will say at once, "Of course; without that there is no vital religion." Ask him again if he believes in the genuineness of the mystical experiences of men whereby power and joy flow into them from the Unseen to regenerate and transfigure their life, and he will hasten to admit the affirmative. Ask him if he believes that life is a closed system of a purely deterministic type and he will deny it as vehemently as the most crass supernaturalist. Inquire further whether since his God is not merely and exclusively intra-natural, He must not be regarded as also super-natural and he will waver and hesitate and stammer and end with some muddlesome apology about not liking the term super-natural. That is just it. It is the word, not the thing, that he finds objectionable; the word, and especially the superstitious associations of the word. But unless we are to lapse into dull secularism or sheer pantheism; unless we are to regard God as exclusively intra-natural, it is clear we must recognise the Supernatural. Mere immanentism showed its helplessness and futility in the "New Theology," and it is not without significance that its most conspicuous advocate has now recanted and gone over to dogmatic Anglicanism.

In view of this popular prejudice against a good and useful word to express a true idea, it is not idle or offensive to point out, even to those who know Latin, that "super" means "above," and that therefore super-nature means simply above nature. If then we are to distinguish (and by distinguishing I do not, of course, mean separating) God and Nature, we must not shrink from using a convenient word that shows that we believe in a beyond and an above as well as in a within nature.

If we believe in the very slightest degree in free will, in "this main miracle that thou art thou with power on thine act and on the world," then we admit at once that man has something supernatural in him, and that by his act of free-will he sets a new direction of causation, if not also a new fact of causation, into being and thereby supernaturally "intervenes" and "interferes" with nature regarded in the ordinary scientific sense as a self-actuating system or invariable order. To say, as I heard it recently said, that God does not intervene in mundane affairs is to say that God does not interfere with us nor we, in his given power, with mundane affairs. And that is the death of religion.

There are in this connection four ways of regarding reality. (1) There is the mechanical materialistic way; (2) There is the way of Deism in which Nature is a clock-work arrangement, with which God, as purely super-natural, interferes only by special miracles. He is a sort of absentee landlord, who makes capricious and arbitrary visits to his estate for alterations and repairs; (3) There is the immanental, pantheistic, absolutist-monistic way in which God is regarded as an exclusively intra-natural life, pervading nature and present in every throb and pulse of it, but in no wise coming into it from a beyond or an above; (4) There is the way of combining immanence with transcendence, intra-naturalism with super-naturalism, which may be described as Pan*en*theism as distinguished from Pantheism, all being in God and God being in all, but not all (including sin) being identified absolutely and monistically with God.

Let us use a crude figure to illustrate these distinctions, remembering, to avoid captious criticism, that they are mere illustrations and nothing more.

(1) Materialism is a dry toilet sponge.

(2) Deism is the same sponge with a tap above it yielding "rare and refreshing" drops of water.

(3) Absolutist monism is the same sponge saturated with water but self-contained, enduringly wet, but cut off from fresh supplies or somehow generating such supplies from within itself.

(4) Panentheism, which combines intra-naturalism with super-naturalism, is a living sponge immersed in the living infinite sea which flows through and under and over and around it—a sponge responsive to mysterious tides and currents and nourished by the ocean's life, and the ocean being responsive to the needs of the sponge.

It is the last only that serves, even faintly, to express the truth, "In Him we live and move and have our being," and "Ye are the temples of the Holy Ghost."

Religion has to recover this sense of the Supernatural or die. It will not die; that is, it will recover this truth. Indeed it is recovering it. Father Tyrrell's swan-song, "Christianity at the Cross-Roads," prepared our minds by shaking them out of their complacent and philistine rationalistic-Protestantism. The whole mystical movement of to-day helps the process, notwithstanding all its subjective aberrations. Mr. A. J. Balfour's volume of Gifford Lectures on "Theism and Humanism" is a vivid sign of the times. But no group of writers is doing more valuable service to-day, in this respect, than the Mirfield Community of the Resurrection.

Dr. Figgis has put us all under the deepest obligation by such vital and kindling books as his 'Gospel and Human Needs,' 'Civilisation at the Cross Roads,' and his suggestive new volume, 'The Fellowship of the Mystery.'

And now comes the Norrisian Prize Essay on 'Conduct and the Supernatural,' by Mr. L. S. Thornton. It is a fascinating and masterly analysis of the fashionable and destructive "immoralist" ethics of men like Nietzsche, John Davidson, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. H. G. Wells, Mr. Garrod, Herr Houston Chamberlain (of Pan-Teutonic ill-fame). There is abundant material for criticising the book; but for the main argument I have nothing but admiration and gratitude. There is, of course, the Mirfield tendency to exploit the situation in favour of dogmatic orthodoxy. But this is a piece of sheer propagandist opportunism which will deceive no intelligent reader. We are not going to believe in witchcraft and black magic, nor necessarily in the Virgin Birth or the raising of Lazarus simply because we believe with these men in the Super-natural. Save for an occasional aside there is nothing in Mr. Thornton's book which a reasonable Free Catholic cannot admit as whole-heartedly as the author. I can do best service to the reader and to the volume by quoting, in conclusion, a striking illustration which conveys the essential ethical attitude.

"The great ocean bears along many goodly, living things in the current of its waters; but when the tide casts them high upon the beach they become decaying corpses and stale rubbish, foul and poisonous. Even so the great tide of other-worldly love, because it is sacrificial, bears along with it all the goodness of the natural order and brings forth continually rich materials for earthly happiness. Yet, if these treasures, so hardly won for mankind by the sacrificial power of love, be stranded high and dry upon the beach, they will at once turn to decay. Earthly goods, ideas of earthly comfort, if separated from that tide of spiritual power which brought them into being, become at once desacramentalised, and so lose their worth. Nay, more, these cast-up leavings of the spiritual world have something peculiarly offensive about them....In the Christian scheme, therefore, happiness remains the product of a virtuous activity within the other-worldly sphere. Even as it comes forth it becomes the means to something greater than itself. The Utilitarian, on the other hand, in making the earthly happiness of all his highest end, is as one who, lacking faith or courage for the fisherman's art, is content to gather dead things from the rubbish thrown up by the tide."

Let us believe that this war will make us ready to grasp this truth in all its agonising fruitfulness.

THE FASCINATION OF MAPS.

ATLAS OF THE HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY OF THE HOLY LAND. Designed and edited by George Adam Smith, D.D., and prepared under the direction of J. G. Bartholomew, LL.D. London: Hodder & Stoughton. 25*s*. net.

THE first edition of the 'Historical Geography of the Holy Land' was published in 1894. The companion volume of maps has only just appeared. More than twenty years is a long time to wait, and meanwhile a new generation of students and readers has been born. But we should be niggards to complain, when the gift, now that it is in our hands, is such a rich and beautiful one. Scholarship, observation and the highest skill in map-drawing have combined to produce a volume which has no rival in its own field. It will make an instant appeal to all who understand the fascination of maps, while the extent of its historical survey and the fine quality of its explanatory notes make it one of the books which the serious student will desire to have constantly at hand for reference. There are sixty maps and plans, ranging from the dawn of history in the Semitic world to the present political divisions of Palestine. Many of them are intended to illustrate Old Testament history, but almost equal attention has been paid to the Roman period, the expansion of Christianity and the Crusades. We may call special attention to the series of large scale maps of four miles to the inch, and the skill with which the maps illustrating the physical features of the country, its geology and vegetation, have been drawn. There is no need to emphasise the close connection between history and geography; the old bad days when they were studied in closed compartments have gone, with the result that maps have become human documents. For the intelligent eye they are pictures of human development and of the physical conditions which have often determined the rise and fall of nations. No country, not even the British Isles touching Europe on one side and looking out towards America on the other, illustrates the importance of geographical position better than Palestine. If any one will consider the significance of map 10, which illustrates the ancient trade routes to Palestine, and then turn to the maps of the growth and expansion of Christianity, he will grasp at once the physical and political reasons for the trend westwards. The future lay towards the sea and not in the trackless lands beyond the great rivers. The cartographers of Gotha were the pioneers in the educational value of maps, but they no longer have the field to themselves. The 'Oxford Historical Atlas,' the Map Supplement issued with the 'Cambridge Modern History,' and the new 'Historical Atlas of Modern Europe,' issued at a popular price by the Oxford University Press, illustrate English work in this field at its best. This atlas of the historical geography of the Holy Land is the equal of any of them, whether native or foreign, in the clearness of its drawing and the thoroughness of its research.

RUSSIA THROUGH WESTERN EYES.

THE WAY OF MARTHA AND THE WAY OF MARY. By Stephen Graham. London: Macmillan & Co. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

MR. STEPHEN GRAHAM'S Russian vein is one that has a powerful attraction for many minds. It has about it the glamour of the unfamiliar. It is soft and kindly and sentimental; and the strange beauty of soul, which he describes, is placed in sharp contrast with what we recognise as ugly or hard or repellent in ourselves. As, however, we read page after page, with its monotonous praise of the untutored Russian peasant, we are left with the question whether after all we have come into contact with a real world or only looked into dreamland through the coloured medium of another man's temperament. Mr. Graham has been led captive by the dangerous literary device of rhetorical contrasts. East and West, action and contemplation, Martha and Mary slip easily from his pen, and he arranges men and nations in types according to this classification, and arouses more than a suspicion that he finds what he goes to seek. We agree that a deeper and more intelligent appreciation of Russian character and ideals is much needed, but we doubt whether we shall advance far in that direction if we begin with a rather forced admiration of the remnants of hermit life in the Nitrian desert, because it was from there that Christianity travelled to Russia, or wander into Russian churches in the chastened mood which feels that everything which is different must necessarily be better. In his books Mr. Graham is an interpreter of himself and his artistic attitude towards the problems of life rather than an interpreter of Russia. We do not mean that the things which he describes did not really happen, but that he is conscious chiefly of the way in which they affect his own feeling, or the use which he can make of them in a picture. This caution seems to us necessary in the interest of a good understanding, and perhaps not less for the sake of the people, a numerous class, who are anxious for cordial relations with Russian men and women, and hope that there is a little more flesh and blood and healthy energy in them than suits the pale beauty of Mr. Graham's literary art. The value for us then in his book lies not in its moralisings, or even in his own judgments, but in the descriptions of the things which he has seen and heard. It is not such a wonderful picture gallery as the volume on the Russian pilgrims to Jerusalem, but it contains many beautiful and touching passages, like the chapter on the Festival of the Dead, and some others in which the feeling for hard fact is allowed for a moment to have free play. From this point of view the tavern scene may perhaps be given the first place:—

"The atmosphere is heavy with the smoke of the vilest tobacco in the world (makhorka). A blind man is playing the concertina, several people are singing, hawkers with pies, with Bibles, with shirts, with pencils, with old clothes, are going from table to table offering their wares. There is tremendous bargaining and long-drawn out haggling on the part of people who, it would seem, do not really intend to buy, even at the last. There are beggars, cripples, blind men, dwarfs, asking for alms in the name of Christ. There are drunken hooligans trying to get drinks for nothing. There are anti-diluvian pilgrims hundreds of miles from home, not going to a shrine, but collecting coppers throughout all Russia for the building of a new church in their far-away villages.... Throughout the whole tavern all day and almost all night is a clamour of talking and an animated scene of gesticulating, unwashed, ragged men and women. Almost all the small business of hawkers, stall-keepers, and little traders is accomplished over vodka or tea in the traktir, but indeed the successful, even the millionaire peasant merchant will step without a ruffle of dignity into the most miserable tavern of the city, and not be too proud to answer the taunts or questions of ragamuffins."

It may be a vulgar taste on our part, but we prefer Mr. Graham in passages like this, where he is himself so much absorbed in the human interest of what he sees that he forgets to improve the occasion. They also reveal the life of Russia as something far more rich and varied than it would be easy to divine from his habitual admiration of failure or the religious formula which gives its title to the book.

WOMEN AND THE FUTURE OF ENGLAND.

THE following address to girls by Miss Edith Drummond, the Headmistress of the Bridlington High School, has just appeared in the last number of the School Magazine:—

"The year that has just gone, with all its terrible sufferings and anxieties, has taught us many lessons, but for the moment it is of the future rather than of the past that I want to speak, however hard it seems to see beyond the immediate horror of the war. But with all that is unknown, one thing we do know—that England is going to win through, and that then there will be a new and most difficult future to be faced, full of problems which, as yet, we cannot understand. For the old England, as it was before the war, has gone for ever, and as we face the unknown future we must realise that it lies with each of us to see that a fairer and a nobler England is built. And in this future women are going to count as never before; already, every day, the chances of doing good and useful work are increased; many professions which formerly were entirely in the hands of men are now being thrown open to women, and women are being asked to assume responsibilities which they have never known before. Now to all these calls the most splendid response has been made, but a great deal of the work undertaken under stress of the present excitement is more or less stopgap, and when the war is over and the work of reconstruction begins England will need every good, steady brain, every pair of strong, capable hands, to build up once more what the war is now destroying. It behoves us all then to ask in what way we are preparing for the girls of to-day to become those women of to-morrow of whom England will be proud, and it is on this question of preparation that I want to make two suggestions. The first is that it is the educated, qualified woman who will be needed most. Already, to-day, I have seen girls and women keen and eager to help, but incapable of taking the part they should because they lack the necessary training or education. Nearly every professional course of training now demands that a girl shall have reached a certain standard of general education, which can only be got at school, and schooldays can never come over again. Make up your minds then that, however unimportant school lessons and examinations may seem, you will put your whole heart into them, and not let any opportunity for qualifying in some way for possible future work, slip by you. And then, secondly, remember that the future is going to be very difficult. England can never settle back to the old ways; the old pleasure-loving spirit which was eating like a canker through much of our life, will have to go, and we should thank God for that. But let us see to it that each of the women, like the men we send out, can 'endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ,' for without that our help will be of little avail—and let us begin now. It is not only during the war that we must learn to put selfish wants and pleasures on one side, and give and give again, but we must carry that spirit forward into the future. It is what our country needs of us; it is what our life is meant for. It is this thought that I want you to take forward into the New Year:—

Our life is but a little holding, lent
To do a mighty labour; we are one
With heaven and the stars when it is spent
To serve God's aim, else die we with the sun."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

NEW YEAR'S MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

THE following New Year's Greeting has been sent to the scholars connected with the Sunday School Association throughout the country by the President, Miss Clephan:—

MY DEAR GIRLS AND BOYS,—I am going to wish you all a Happy New Year. What! when all the world is so full of sorrow and suffering, and so many homes are desolate? How can we look for a happy year?

It depends on what we mean by happiness. If happiness means just having a good time, getting all we want for ourselves, then there is not much reason to look for happiness this year. But if it means giving, not getting; if it means what Christ meant when he gave himself in service to the needy, the helpless, and the sorrowful, when he went about doing good, then we may look for happiness, perhaps more certainly this year than ever before.

Are we not all learning this great lesson of service? Is not each one trying to do his—or her—bit? The young man who gives his life to serve his country; the young woman who takes up the work he has had to leave, or who ministers to the wounded; the little schoolgirl whose nimble fingers knit warm woollen comforts for the brave soldiers at the front; the boy scout who pledges allegiance to the ideals of truth, honour, discipline, unselfishness?

And that is all that is asked of us. God has put us into this wonderful world to do just our own bit of service—that one particular bit that none other can do but you—or me. God has made a place for each one of us, and if we do not fill it with our best work something is left undone; God's work is hindered, and the whole world is the poorer.

Did you ever think, boys and girls, that you were so important to the world's welfare? You have often thought that you ought to get the good things of life, have you ever thought that you ought to give the good things of life too? And yet that is what life really means—it means service for others.

But perhaps the little ones will say "the world is so big, and we are so small, what can we do to help this big world?" Ah, little folks, you can do much; you can smile instead of frowning when things go wrong; you can be loving, and willing, and merry; and the love and laughter and happy faces of little children cheer up the older folks and make them feel young again.

So, when we are inclined to say "What can I do? I am but one," let us remember to add, "I am but one, but I am one." You could not any single one of you have given that fine Motor Ambulance for the wounded soldiers in France, but each one of you in our Sunday Schools did your "bit," and all your bits together were sufficient to buy the Ambulance that you all rejoiced to send.

Let us each give to the world our best service during the coming year, and it will then be a happy year. And that it may be so for you all is the wish of

Your friend,

ANNIE E. CLEPHAN,
President.

PRESENTATION TO THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

THE Rev. J. J. Wright has just completed twenty-five years' ministry at Chowbent Chapel. In commenting upon the fact The Atherton Journal says: "Since entering upon his ministry at the historic chapel, Mr. Wright has by his earnest and simply-eloquent sermons, his untiring labours, his kindness of heart, and many amiable qualities not only greatly endeared himself to his own flock, but he has won the admiration of all sects and classes of the community. It is certainly a quarter of a century's work well and faithfully done." At the annual congregational tea party at Chowbent Chapel on Christmas Day a purse and an illuminated album containing an address were presented to Mr. Wright by Mr. Robert Greenhalgh, J.P., on behalf of the Chapel and Sunday School. The address records the high appreciation of the congregation of the faithful manner in which Mr. Wright has discharged his ministerial duties, and the noble and untiring efforts made by him for the progress of all social movements in the town. "We also gratefully acknowledge," it says, "the high spiritual ideal you have put before us in your ministrations, and the kindly and courteous manner which has marked your life in our midst, together with your deep sympathy for those in need of it. During your long ministry your successful and devoted labours for Unitarianism, and all that it stands for, have abundantly deserved the honourable recognition which we now desire to convey, and in asking you to accept this expression of esteem and gratitude we earnestly pray that God's blessing may rest on you and yours, and that you may be spared for many years to work in the Master's holy service." Great regret was expressed that Mr. Charles Eckersley, J.P., who has so generously endowed the congregation with almost everything that a congregation could desire, as Mr. Greenhalgh said, was prevented by illness from being present. The Rev. J. J. Wright gave expression to the gratitude and pleasure with which he had received the gifts in a speech marked by characteristic warmth of feeling and appreciation of the good qualities of all who had helped to make the period of his ministry so fruitful of results. He had, he said, expected this to be the quietest of all their Christmas parties, and they had made it for him perhaps the most memorable in his life.

IN the list of names recommended in Sir John French's recent dispatch, published in The Times on New Year's Day, "for gallant and distinguished service in the field," we notice that of Capt. L. S. Farquharson (Royal Scots), son of the Rev. A. and Mrs. Farquharson, who was killed in action in France a few months ago.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in his New Year's message, published in the January Calendar of the Old Meeting Church, writes as follows: "To the members of our church I wish all that truest friends may wish to one another. Happy, in the ordinary sense, the year cannot be, for it is already too deeply predestined to tragedy. If, soon or late, it is made famous by the restoration of peace, and such a peace as just men desire, even so, we shall not escape the awful aftermath of anguish. But our Christian Faith has never promised the cheap and shallow happiness of the world. It offers something more pure and solid—the 'good cheer' that is proof against calamity—the joy that is distilled through renunciation and tears. We are now invited to reincorporate ourselves in that mystical fellowship of suffering and triumph, which has been sanctified by the blood of Christ, and by the heroic labours and prayer and sacrificial deaths of noble soldiers and martyrs, and of those hidden saints of God whose names are unrecorded save in the Book of Eternal Life. . . . Finally, I would ask you to be of good heart concerning the future of The Old Meeting Church. That in such a time as this, when churches are sadly depleted and disorganised, we should have the surprising gladness of welcoming so many new members is a cause for fervent thanksgiving and rejoicing. May God of his Goodness continue to bless the Church and every member of it and make us all worthier of his favour!"

Liverpool.—On Sunday morning, January 2, a Confirmation Service was held in Ullet Road Church, and was conducted by the Revs. J. C. Odgers and H. Taylor. Thirty young men and women were confirmed. This service was a fitting sequel to attendance at Mr. Taylor's Adult Class in the Sunday School, but beyond sixteen members of that class, and three members of another class, there were present five recently appointed teachers and a few others who in former years were members of the Sunday School, or were constant attenders at the church services. All those confirmed took part in the Communion Service which followed the Confirmation. The service seems to have been in accord with felt needs. Its object was to emphasise the call of the church to the individual, to remind young people of the need of self-government as they became more and more conscious of life's duties and responsibilities, and to offer them a warm welcome into fellowship with the congregation.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE INDIAN VILLAGER.

The President of the Indian National Congress, Sir S. P. Sinha, whose address at the recent proceedings in Bombay made a great impression, in winding up the proceedings of the Congress laid special stress on the necessity of having a continuous programme, not only of political work, but of work for uplifting the poor and weak, and abolishing ignorance, poverty and disease. TOWARDS A LASTING SETTLEMENT

Edited by CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

Crown 8vo. Cloth. 2s 6d. net.

This work is inspired by the predominant aim of securing that a catastrophe such as the present War shall never recur. It is an examination of the problems which it is indispensable to understand if we are to be enabled to advocate or to criticise any scheme of international reconstruction, and to lay the foundation of a permanent peace. The names of the writers are a guarantee both that the treatment will be thorough, and that the various subjects will be presented with vividness and lucidity.

THE CONTENTS OF THE VOLUME INCLUDE:—

The Basis of Permanent Peace

The Parallel of the Great French War

Democracy and Publicity in Foreign Affairs

The Democratic Principle and International Relations

A FEW PRESS OPINIONS:—

"The essays are contributions of real help towards the solution of great and inevitable problems. The form which international control in political matters ought to take is cleverly discussed."—PROF. GILBERT MURRAY in The Nation.

"I would recommend the healing counsel given in 'Towards a Lasting Settlement.' It is truly a harbinger of Peace. Its message is for us all. Written by many authors, all its pages make for the abolition of war."—Church Times.

"A very notable book has just been published, which every reader of the Labour Leader should obtain. To state the contents will be sufficient to whet the appetite of all who are concerned with these vital problems, and one feels it to be impossible to give the least indication of the wealth and worth of the volume."—Labour Leader.

"That the possibilities of war may be lessened by such means as the contributors suggest, we believe to be true."—Catholic Herald.

"While expressing their opinions clearly and frankly, the writers have been careful to avoid whatever might tend to exasperate opponents, and their reasoned appeals will receive the greater attention because of the absence of declamatory rhetoric and invective."—Aberdeen Journal.

them in the best way you can," he said, "never mind self-government, national militia, or even local self-government, but run to the rescue of the poor and weak. It is the people of the villages who till the soil and live by the sweat of their brow who must ultimately govern the country. Let us be able to say that we took our proper share in bringing about this consummation."

Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's Medal for Valour.

Friends and admirers of Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, now Commandant of the First British Ambulance Unit for Italy, will have heard with pleasure that the King of Italy has awarded him the silver medal for military valour in consequence of conspicuous acts of coolness and bravery while removing wounded men, and cholera patients, from hospitals which were undergoing a heavy bombardment from the Austrian guns. His superior officer, Colonel Morino, concludes his report in these words:—"Mr. Trevelyan's action in this matter was particularly remarkable for the excellent dispositions made and for the courage displayed by him. The latter excited the emulation of those present all the more because, belonging as he does to another nation, even though a friendly one, it gave proof of complete altruism and of the highest spirit of self-sacrifice. I beg, therefore, to recommend Mr. George Macaulay Trevelyan for the silver medal for Military Valour, partly for this action, partly as representing his colleagues and collaborators, and in his capacity as Commandant of the First British Ambulance Unit for Italy." In granting this application, King Victor Emmanuel paid a graceful tribute to the work of the whole unit, which has indeed earned the enthusiastic approval of the Italian authorities ever since its arrival at the front nearly four months ago.

Cruelty to Live Poultry.

Mr. Hubert J. Greenwood, Chairman of the County of London War Hospital Committee, has made a strong protest in a letter to The Times on behalf of his committee against the cruelty involved in forwarding live poultry from Ireland. Out of one consignment of 100 geese, which were packed together in four crates measuring 60 in. by 37 in. by 13 in., the boards being so close that it was impossible for a bird to get its head out, eight birds were dead on arrival, eight others were unable to stand owing to cramp and weakness, and five died shortly afterwards. The facts were laid before the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, but the Society is practically powerless in the matter, as proceedings would have to be instituted in Ireland, where no sympathy has so far been shown by the authorities, and this would necessitate witnesses being sent there. Mr. G. G. Greenwood, M.P., endorses what his namesake has said, but from his own knowledge would not limit criticism to Ireland, as such cruelty only too frequently occurs within the limits of Great Britain also. He points out that the Protection of Animals Act, 1911, which he introduced in the House of Commons, as originally drafted, contained a clause designed to protect live poultry under such circumstances. This was withdrawn by the promoters of the Bill at the suggestion of the then President of the Board of Agriculture, upon his undertaking to bring in a measure to enable the Board to make Orders under the Diseases of Animals Act for such purpose; and, in accordance with such undertaking, the Poultry Act, 1911, was duly introduced and passed into law, giving the Board power to make the necessary orders. Up to the present time none have been issued, in spite of the fact that the S.P.C.A. has made repeated applications, and no sufficient reason appears to be forthcoming as to why the regrettable cruelties alluded to are allowed to go on.

Women's Maternity Unit for Russia.

A bitter cry has reached England as to the peasant populations from the war-zone between the Russian armies and those of the Central Empires. Fleeing from before the scourge of war, the plight of hundreds of thousands of these refugees from Poland and elsewhere is terrible and is likely to be worse as the Russian winter advances. Our ally, Russia, is putting forth what aid is possible, but when in Petrograd alone there are over a million additional inhabitants this winter, it will be realised that the strain is great. The need for skilled workers is desperate, and the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, desiring to meet a claim so urgent on behalf of suffering women and children, has offered to send a fully equipped Maternity Unit to Petrograd without delay. The Unit has been welcomed by the Russian authorities; and Her Imperial Majesty, the Empress Alexandra, has graciously granted it her protection; the Grand Duchess Kyril and the Lady Georgina Buchanan are its immediate patronesses. The Unit will proceed to Petrograd, where it will work under the title of "The British Women's Hospital." The total cost of the Unit for six months will be at least £5,000, and in view of the urgency and awfulness of the need it is hoped that contributions may pour in generously and at once. All communications should be made to the Hon. Secretary, Russian Unit, National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, 14, Parliament Street, S.W.

The Christus of the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play.

It was recently stated that Anton Lang, whose reverent presentation of the central figure in the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau many of our readers will probably have seen, had been killed while fighting in France. Mrs. Montgomery, who has got into communication with Frau Lang through a neutral country, has received a letter from the latter saying that her husband is well, and still at home in his peaceful village. He has been trained for hospital work, but has not yet been called up.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

Now that the Belgian Hospital Fund has reached the golden mile-stone of £10,000 it is not unnatural that some of our supporters should be inclined to rest and be thankful—at least, for a few weeks. We know that we have begged our hardest, that we have been very importunate, and we are deeply sensible of the readiness and liberality of the response. The first weeks in January make heavy demands upon the taxpayer and the subscriber to charities, and the smaller list of donations which appears to-day is a natural result. That, however, is only temporary; the work goes on. No opportunity of usefulness that has come to us has ever been refused. We begin the second year of our work with a confidence based upon a most happy experience in the readiness of our supporters to meet our demands. We have all found such deep sources of happiness in helping. That has been the real source of our success.

THE ink of the foregoing lines was hardly dry when we received the news of Mr. C. W. Chitty's fine effort on our behalf, and suddenly a poor week has been turned into an unusually rich one. He has made a collection of £264 from the men with whom he is associated in business, the millers of Kent. Mr. Chitty has taken a deep interest in our work from the beginning and has shown it in many practical ways. We are deeply grateful to him for this crowning act of generosity.

MAY we call special attention to the gracious and beautiful letter from a Belgian nun, which we print to-day. It is one of three which have just been received. Reading between the lines no one can fail to be struck with the cheerful courage and the simple devotedness of these women as they carry on their work of mercy in a foreign land. It is work among refugee children for whom all the joys and the tender care of home are at an end for the present. These sisters are acting the part of both father and mother and doing their best to make the boys and girls under their care feel that there is still love for them in the world. We shall send out a large quantity of boots and clothing to help them, and other things will go as well to add some elements of simple pleasure to these children's lives.

THE most important military operation of the past week has been the complete evacuation of the Gallipoli Peninsula. The astounding brilliancy of the manœuvre almost makes us forget the bitterness of failure, of which it is the public avowal. It is not the time to try to arrive at an impartial verdict upon the enterprise as a whole, or to estimate the importance of the secondary results which may have been achieved. That may all be left to some future historian of the war, who will have the documents before him and the necessary detachment of mind. No great nation ever succeeded in war without making its share of mistakes and learning fortitude in the school of misfortune. For the moment the feeling in the country is one of immense relief. On the side of the enemy there is some legitimate cause for rejoicing, but it will be tempered by the reflection that these seasoned troops have been withdrawn without loss for more deadly work elsewhere.

A PETITION of the Austrian Government that we should take care to protect her own subjects, who were being repatriated from India on a British ship, from murder by her own submarines has just been published. It is almost incredible in its impertinence and its lack of humour, and a final touch is given to it by the delicate reminder that the majority of the women concerned were "better-class people." Our Foreign Office must have rejoiced when they received it at the completeness of the unconscious confession that murderous attacks upon passenger steamers are part of a settled and premeditated policy. All the evasions and hollow excuses which have played so large a part in this controversy, are at one stroke swept off the board. The petition is an open avowal of criminality, which will not be forgotten.

SIR EDWARD GREY has not been slow to turn the tables upon his clumsy opponent. His reply, barbed with a pungent irony which we fear will be lost upon the Central Powers, is a complete statement of the British case:—

> With regard to that portion of the petition [he writes] which asks that special precautions may be taken to prevent danger to the lives of the "Golconda" passengers by submarine attack, I feel bound to express my astonishment that the Austro-Hungarian Government, themselves one of the authors of the danger, should have thought it seemly to endorse this request. Not content, however, with doing this, the Austro-Hungarian Government further state that they will hold His Majesty's Government responsible for the lives and well-being of those passengers, "the majority of whom are better-class people." I am at a loss to know why "better-class people" should be thought more entitled to protection from submarine attack than any other non-combatants, but, however that may be, the only danger of the character indicated which threatens any of the passengers on the "Golconda" is one for which the Austro-Hungarian and German Governments are alone responsible. It is they and they only who have instituted and carry on a novel and inhuman form of warfare, which disregards all the hitherto accepted principles of international law, and necessarily endangers the lives of non-combatants..... It is needless to add that His Majesty's Government do not propose to take any precautions on behalf of Austro-Hungarian subjects which they do not take on behalf of their own, and that if they suffer any injury from submarine attack on the part of His Majesty's enemies, the responsibility must rest solely with those who have made such attacks part of their ordinary methods of warfare. The proper and sufficient protection from this danger is that Austria-Hungary and Germany should observe ordinary rules of humanity in their methods of warfare.

IT is the small nations that have suffered most horribly in this war. They stand in the way of the Will-to-power, and must be crushed wherever ambitious schemes of expansion are on foot—such is the brutal theory which Germany has enforced. The right of these small nations to exist is thus one of the cardinal principles which are at stake. The victory of the Central Powers would at once put them upon a basis of bare sufferance, and their whole life would be dominated by the military and political terrorism of their stronger neighbours. This is the threat which hangs over Belgium and Serbia, and now the hardy mountaineers of Montenegro are being swept into the same net of destruction. It is for the manhood of our country to deliver them, and no concern for our own convenience must be allowed to damp the ardour of our chivalry towards those who are weaker than ourselves. The only path of safety for our own liberties is to be found in faithfulness to these hard duties. No man must dare to argue about the war and our own share in its burdens without having these considerations clearly in his mind. Even the extreme pacifist cannot rid himself of responsibility for the deliverance of these outraged peoples, and he must have some practical scheme for doing it, more effective than the military measures which most of us approve, if he is not to become the unwilling accomplice of public criminality and the enslavement of the weak by the strong.

WE cannot be too grateful to the Prime Minister for the cool and masterly way, combined with admirable courtesy, with which he has handled the difficulties of a political situation, which for a few days looked almost threatening. He has taken no notice of the silly taunts and innuendoe which have appeared in some quarters. He has succeeded in averting the threatened labour resignations from the Cabinet. He has shown a broad-minded desire to meet the conscientious objector on his own ground and to weigh every legitimate grievance. His own advocacy of the Military Service Bill has been free from any appeal to popular passion, and has been based throughout on his own plain conviction, which is shared by the whole Cabinet, that it is required by the military situation. The result has been a Parliamentary triumph, which represents, we believe, the reasoned conviction and the alert conscience of the country, which sees no other way of dealing with the realities of the situation with strength and justice.

THE purely political opposition to the Bill shows signs of disintegration, for the simple reason that it is difficult to maintain a private opinion that it is needless or inopportune in face of the massed strength of expert advice on the other side. The Manchester Guardian has fought valiantly for its own point of view and stands for political opposition pure and simple. It admits quite frankly that it has no objection to Compulsion on principle; that circumstances may arise which would render it necessary, and that we must submit to it rather than run the risk of defeat. But it pleads that at present we can do without it, and it sets its judgment against that of Mr. Asquith, Sir Edward Grey, Lord Kitchener and Mr. Balfour. Opposition of this kind has no staying power in it; it must disappear for all practical purposes with the passing of the Bill, unless it is pushed to the extreme of trying to create a movement for the overthrow of the ministry. When we are at war we must either accept our leaders or discard them; there is no room for lukewarm middle courses.

THE opposition from the side of Labour is altogether more serious. It has in it an unfortunate element of class-consciousness and a good deal of temper. It is the attitude of men who are not so much convinced as very suspicious. But from the outset it was discounted by the outspoken support of the Bill by Mr. Henderson and the acute cleavage of opinion among the labour members revealed by the division in the House. Much of the speaking at the special Congress, which gave a large vote against Compulsion for military service in any shape or form, avoided the grim realities of the situation altogether, and in its vehemence for untrammelled freedom came strangely from the lips of men, who continually resort to compulsion of a most exacting kind for their own purposes. The situation has been greatly relieved by Mr. Asquith's tactful handling of the whole question, his assurance that there is no intention that the Bill should be a double-edged weapon which can be used to dragoon labour into obedience, and a promise to introduce an amendment to prevent any such abuse of its powers.

OF course considerations of this kind make no difference to the conscientious objector, though we doubt whether he is really so formidable an obstacle in the path of wicked governments as he likes to imagine. The term is a very capacious umbrella, and under it are gathered a rather motley company of people who have really very little in common. There is, we know, the genuine conscientious objector, to whom his alienation from the strong bright manhood of the country is a source of bitter pain; and yet he is so deeply convinced that all war is wicked that he would disband our fleet and disarm our soldiers and surrender to Germany to-morrow in order to save England from her sin. A position like this seems to us to be deeply tinged with fanaticism. We do not admire it because we cannot regard it as good. But we can respect its sincerity and we are anxious to protect it from any kind of violence. When, however, we are asked to give an equal tolerance to every form of disaffection, which expresses itself in argument or debate, we can only make our appeal, as all sensible men must do at this tragic hour when the fate of other nations is so intimately dependent upon our own, from abstractions to realities. We need Mr. Asquith's sharp reminder to Sir John Simon, that while he agreed with him in many of his ideals, it is no time for wandering through the groves and along the streams of academic thought, because we are at war.

> We are engaged [he said] in a war in which not only our existence but those ideals are at stake, and to contend that it is a derogation or an abandonment, morally or intellectually, of our position as among the protagonists in that war that we should have adopted for a specific, for a limited, and for a strictly guarded purpose, a principle which our nearest Ally, the French Republican nation, regards as essential to the preservation of its democratic institutions, does seem to me to be losing sight of realities, or, at any rate, to be forfeiting your sense of proportion and perspective.

THE RECOVERY OF CHARACTER.

RUDYARD KIPLING'S new tractate, 'The Fringes of the Fleet' is alive. It is not the kind of writing which circles round a subject. It goes straight to its heart, and it gives to the reader eyes and ears and a mind pricked to alertness and sympathy in presence of something glorious and good. Prose like this is as rare as a great poem. It is not the least part of its excellence that it will hold the attention of unlettered people; for its language is as simple and direct as that of the Bible or 'The Pilgrim's Progress,' and like them it has the secret of racy narrative and the human touch. Most of us will read it first of all for the absorbing interest of what it tells us. It holds us breathless with the sheer excitement of hair-breadth escapes. The spirit of adventure which animates the men who do business in great waters, takes possession of us. And when we close the book we are not likely to forget this picture of the fringes of the fleet, the patrols, the mine-sweepers, the submarines, who watch and guard and hunt with ceaseless vigilance. It rekindles all our slumbering pride in our race. The sailors who man these queer craft are our defenders. We sleep safely in our beds and are exempt from the worst horrors of war because they face all the dangers that lurk in the sea or the air or beneath the waves. They work with an odd quietness, without fuss or boastfulness. Danger has made them keen, and death they simply accept when it comes. "The main fact," as Mr. Kipling observes, "is that the work is being done. Whether it was necessary or politic to re-awaken by violence every sporting instinct of a sea-going people is a question which the enemy may have to consider later on."

But this little book is something more than a splendid tribute to the efficiency of the auxiliaries of the grand fleet. It is written in praise of some of the best traits of English character, its dutifulness, its honesty, its hatred of cruelty and lying. There was something that fascinated Mr. Kipling more than the strangeness of the experience and the triumph of mechanical skill as he went down in a submarine.

> "'There's the bottom. We bumped at fifty—fifty-two,' he said.
> "'I didn't feel it.'
> "'We'll try again. Watch the gauge and you'll see it flick a little.'
> "It may have been so, but I was more interested in the faces, and above all, the eyes, all down the length of her. It was to them, of course, the simplest of manœuvres. They dropped into gear as no machine could; but the training of years and the experience of the year leaped up behind those steady eyes under the electrics in the shadow of the tall motors, between the pipes and the curved hull, or glued to their special gauges. One forgot the bodies altogether—but one will never forget the eyes or the ennobled faces. One man I remember in particular. On deck he was no more than a grave, rather striking countenance, cast in the unmistakeable petty officer's mould. Below, as I saw him in profile, handling a vital control, he looked like the Doge of Venice, the Prior of some sternly ruled monastic order; an old-time Pope—anything that signifies trained and stored intellectual power utterly and ascetically devoted to some vast impersonal end. And so, with a much younger man, who changed into such a monk as Frank Dicksee used to draw."

This complete absorption in the task of the moment, in which personal risk simply does not count, is joined to unfailing tenderness towards the weak and helpless and a fundamental sense of decency in performing the grim tasks of war. We read of a submarine with this record: "Came across a dhow with a Turkish skipper. He seemed so miserable that I let him go." And of another which "overhauled a steamer full of Turkish passengers, some of whom, arguing on their Allies' lines, promptly leaped overboard. Our boat fished them out and returned them, for she was not killing civilians." The whole moral situation as it exists for our sailors—of course they would not call it by such a grand name—is summed up in the following scraps of conversation:—

> "'Oh, if Fritz only fought clean, this wouldn't be half a bad show. But Fritz can't fight clean.'
> "'And we can't do what he does—even if we were allowed to,' one said.
> "'No, we can't. 'Tisn't done. We have to fish Fritz out of the water, dry him, and give him cocktails, and send him to Donnington Hall.'
> "'And what does Fritz do?' I asked.
> "'He sputters and clicks and bows. He has all the correct motions, you know; but, of course, when he's your prisoner you can't tell him what he really is.'
> "'And do you suppose Fritz understands any of it?' I went on.
> "'No. Or he wouldn't have lusitaniaed. This war was his first chance of making his name, and he chucked it all away for the sake of showin' off as a foul Gottstrafer.'"

We have placed the words "The Recovery of Character" at the head of this article. It is a true way of describing something wonderful that has happened to us. We—our whole people—have been drawn under the magnetic influence of the virtues which are described in Mr. Kipling's pages. We had never really lost them, for over and over again, in a railway accident or a burning mine, we have seen the same spirit of personal heroism and contempt of danger. But they have tended to drop out of sight, especially among large sections of our city populations. Industrial competition and absorption in the prudent getting of money made men careful about themselves. Our habit of talking, and the value we attached to the rhetoric of the platform and the pulpit, turned even our plainest duties into problems. And over all our life there was spread an air of false security, in which a policy of go-as-you-please was accepted as the highest expression of human freedom. Into the midst of this jostling crowd of human beings there came the thunderbolt of the war, with its fiery discipline, and its call to men, as they valued their manhood, not to argue but to obey. Suddenly we saw our cranky opinions and our selfish purposes, and all the arts we had used to make ourselves appear clever or important in the eyes of the world, as the vain things which they really are. We tasted the almost forgotten joy of surrendering ourselves completely to impersonal ends, and became conscious of the deep community of purpose which binds us together as one people with a divine mission on this earth. Our young men have gone to practise these lessons of moral simplicity and obedience in the school of danger and suffering. It is they who help to man the fringes of the fleet, and it is they, too, who are the true custodians of our national tradition of fearlessness, simplicity, and obedience. And we who remain behind can only be worthy to receive this inestimable gift of moral renewal at their hands, if we keep watch with them and support them day by day with our unstinted sympathy and approval. Remembering, as we needs must, that a brave man is more worthy of our regard than a clever one, and that stout words are a poor substitute for noble deeds, we can desire no higher result for our own lives from these hours of testing and purgation than some recovery of reverence for plain and homely goodness, that in us, as in them, obedience and discipline may have their perfect work.

Whether their fame centuries long should ring,
They cared not over-much,
But cared greatly to serve God and the King,
And keep the Nelson touch;

And fought to build Britain above the tide
Of wars and windy fate;
And passed content, leaving to us the pride
Of lives obscurely great.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Go back to antique ages, if thine eyes
The genuine mien and character would trace
Of the rash Spirit that still holds her place,
Prompting the world's audacious vanities!
Go back, and see the Tower of Babel rise;
The pyramid extend its monstrous base,
For some Aspirant of our short-lived race,
Anxious an aery name to immortalise.
There, too, ere wiles and politic dispute
Gave specious colouring to aim and act,
See the first mighty Hunter leave the brute
To chase mankind, with men in armies packed
For his field pastime high and absolute,
While, to dislodge his game, cities are sacked!

WORDSWORTH.

Look now on that Adventurer who hath paid
His vows to Fortune; who, in cruel slight
Of virtuous hope, of liberty, and right,
Hath followed whereso'er a way was made
By the blind Goddess—ruthless, undismayed;
And so hath gained at length a prosperous height,
Round which the elements of worldly might Beneath his haughty feet, like clouds, are laid.
O joyless power that stands by lawless force!
Curses are his dire portion, scorn, and hate,
Internal darkness and unquiet breath;
And, if old judgments keep their sacred course,
Him from that height shall Heaven precipitate
By violent and ignominious death.

WORDSWORTH.

RELIGION is of a pure and spotless nature; it is uniform, consistent, and of the same complexion and character in all nations. Languages and customs may greatly differ, but the language of the pure devotion of the heart to its Maker is the same over the face of the whole earth. Religion, therefore, demands our utmost reverence; and, as such, that which was taught by Jesus of Nazareth. I revere the sublime, and yet simple, plain doctrines and truly charitable principles which Christ laid down, and enforced by his own example. His life was a continued scene of active benevolence; no fatigue was too hard to be borne, no inconvenience too great to be submitted to, provided he could instruct the ignorant, reclaim the vicious, relieve the destitute, and comfort the mournful. Such was the religion of Jesus Christ, "who went about doing good." He spoke only of one God, and of Him with the utmost reverence, as his Heavenly Father and the Father of all mankind. Christianity, in its purity, is the most liberal and best religion in the world. Its inspired author preached up the cheerful doctrine of man's reviving again after death, and of the certainty of his afterwards living to eternity, and did his utmost to persuade all mankind to live godly lives, that their souls might thereby be prepared to return to God, the Author and the Giver of all Good, as unblemished as possible; and thus, so far as his influence reached, and his commands were acted upon, he may truly be said to be the Saviour of Mankind. But, there are questions connected with this subject which none but the Almighty God can solve.

From the Memoir of THOMAS BEWICK.

PRAYER.

O LORD GOD, our Governor, we beseech Thee, of Thy mercy, that we may have the heavenly vision, and behold things as they seem unto Thee, that the turmoil of this world may be seen by us to be bringing forth the sweet peace of the eternal years, and that in all the troubles and sorrows of our own hearts we may behold good; and so, with quiet mind and inward peace, careless of outward storm, we may do the duty of life which brings to us a quiet heart, ever trusting in Thee. We give Thee thanks for all Thy mercy. We beseech Thy forgiveness of all our sins. We pray for Thy guidance in all things. Thy Presence in the hour of death, Thy glory in the life to come. Of Thy mercy hear us. Amen.

THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT MOVEMENT.

THE Fight for Right Movement is increasing day by day. Clearly, Sir Francis Younghusband has met a national need. Months ago many of us knew that the nation's effort stopped short of the occasion's duty, but we were scattered, isolated, impotent. Sir Francis Younghusband brought us together, and individual hopes have become the purpose of an organised movement which will not be impotent. Membership in the Fight for Right Movement presupposes two convictions. In the first place it presupposes the conviction that this war is a Fight for Right. Concerning this it cannot be necessary to say much. Obviously, Britain is fighting for moral conceptions which are the soul of Progress and the health of Civilisation.

In the second place, membership in the Movement presupposes the conviction that an organised effort on a large scale is necessary, an effort to call out the deeper moral energy of the English people, and to consecrate it to England's cause.

When war broke out we were quite unprepared for it, our hearts and minds were unprepared. During long and prosperous days of unexacting peace, we had all thought much of ourselves, and scarcely at all of the nation. Traditional forms of industry worked selfishly, and (on the whole) political affairs were sectional, not national; they hid the face of England from her sons and daughters. We English people did not know England our Mother. Her life lived in us, and, without observation, she had fashioned our hearts for something nobler than the profitable or enjoyable routine of our inglorious days; but these things were hid from our eyes. England was a pleasant place, and we mistook its pleasantness for its greatness. Our patriotism was a memory rather than a strength: it lived in after-dinner speeches rather than in effort. This unexpected war made the small satisfactions of those days impertinent, their distinctive interests quite secondary. From the German cannon came a summons which this generation had not heard: how did the nation respond? In this hour of danger and uncertainty let us be strong enough to face the truth. The nation responded half-heartedly. The Fight for Right Movement exists to make the nation's response wholehearted.

These are the two pre-supposed convictions. Is there anything else? Undoubtedly, there is a duty. The Fight for Right Movement is not merely a witness to a need, it is an effort to meet that need. We are banded together, not merely to say something, but to do something; not merely to testify that an effort is necessary, but to make that effort. And how should we make it? By being missionaries of Right. Men are half-hearted because they are variously selfish; we have to uplift them "above the dark edges of the sensual ground" to the patriotism that is self-sacrifice, to the large thoughts that are the wings of victory. England's cause—the freedom that is Right—must become, upon our lips, the burning message of a great hope and an unforgettable faith.

Our pleasant home in this dear land is the shrine and fortress of something infinitely greater than its pleasantness. Centuries of varied suffering and effort had made this land the altar and the throne of Freedom. We, inheriting the work which men and women of bygone days had wrought in blood and tears, had surrounded their work with opulence. But the earlier work remained the greatness of our land, and to-day that greatness is menaced by another greatness. This war is a war for Freedom, and Freedom is our peculiar inheritance, the meaning of our history, the promise of our future. A thriving industry and a world-wide Empire: these things are not inconsiderable, but not because of these things do we love our land, not because of these things is the thought of England an uplifting strength, not because of these things is England a faith and a hope. Greater than these things, eternal as these are transitory, is the spirit that consecrates the high places of England's life, and is a silent strength in the depths of England's soul. Freedom, realised in unselfish manliness; freedom, the promise and potency of brotherliness, of equal comity between individuals and between nations—this is the greatness of our land, the God-ward aspect of its life. And this thing (priceless, august, imperilled) is in our charge to-day. A message? Events have prepared for us a message which might make even dumb lips eloquent.

Sursum corda—lift up your hearts, lift them up to the greatness of your inheritance and your duty. Thus have we to speak, but we upon whom this duty is laid have also another and no less urgent duty. We have to lift up our own hearts. Example is better than precept. We must be not merely voices, but "living epistles." Right must be, not only vivid upon our lips, but evidently potent in our lives. "Lift up your hearts"—the duty which we declare we must acknowledge and perform. Membership in the Fight for Right Movement should be more than a matter of putting down one's name: it should be repentant, humble-minded acceptance of a transcendental vocation. For our country's sake, for Right's sake, we have to "crucify the flesh, with the affections and lusts thereof."

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I point out the all-important distinction between compulsion for military service and compulsion in respect of other matters, e.g. taxation? Taxation merely takes away (part of) a man's money, and, generally speaking, does not touch his capital. Compulsory military service may take a man's life away, and, what some people regard as more objectionable, may compel him to take the life of a fellow-creature. Curiously enough there are some perverse people in our midst who are not reconciled to this by the fact that the fellow-creature is a German. Again, taxation, at any rate direct taxation, can be so levied as to avoid any unfairness, but compulsory military service cannot be so arranged. A and B are young men each earning £200 a year, the former as a bank clerk the latter as an accountant in practice for himself. A returns from the War and starts again at his old salary—possibly, indeed, he has had part of it during his absence—while B returns to find his small connection partly gone, and has earned nothing but his Army pay whilst away. Your reference to France leaves me cold. Much as I admire the French, I should admire them still more if they had voluntary service which, considering their superb patriotism, would probably raise, for practical purposes, as many men as compulsion. It cannot be contended by anyone who recalls the Dreyfus case and other scandals that France is free from militarism. One is bound to say that the working-class distrust of conscription is well founded when one recollects that in France, Italy and South Africa, to mention no other countries, it has been used for strike-breaking. It is immaterial whether the strikes were right or wrong, the point is that, owing to conscription, the strikers fought with their hands tied behind their backs. That suspicion has not been nullified by the indecent haste with which the Government has rushed to introduce compulsory service—on a partial and modified plan, it is true, but it started the same way in other countries—after the most magnificent voluntary response to a country's call that the world has ever known.—Yours, &c.,

DEEDS OF HEROISM IN THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The name of Fraulein Barth of Frankfort, President of the Society for Religious Education, is known to readers of THE INQUIRER. The following, taken from Christliche Freiheit, is from her pen. It contains a suggestion which should commend itself to many of us over here and be worth the consideration of our own Sunday School Associations. Fraulein Barth writes:—

"Some local groups of our Union have undertaken the task of collecting ethical and religious material outside the Bible for use in religious instruction. The war supplies us with many incidents, acts of self sacrifice, instances of a high sense of duty, of self-abnegation, respect for the enemy, all splendid patterns and models of a high moral and religious life. We could not give better examples to our children. I should like to ask for some well authenticated stories. If we have the hoped-for support, we shall perhaps be able to get such a collection together as will be a great help to us, and gain for our religious instruction the values and energies of the present time. The stories must be vouched for and the origins be given. Stories from private letters from the front are preferred...."—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

'THE FREE CATHOLIC.'

WE have received the first number of The Free Catholic, edited by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, which is described as the monthly organ of the Free Catholic Movement. We fear that we must postpone any criticism in detail of its programme, partly because we have a deep distaste for new sectional movements at the present time, but chiefly because the magazine itself gives us very scanty information. This, no doubt, is due partly to its size and the policy which has been adopted of articles almost too short to be illuminating. Of the six articles in its sixteen small pages, those by Prof. Sonnenschein and Mr. H. C. Colles have clearly no special relation to the movement. They might have appeared in our own columns or those of The Church Times with almost equal propriety. The other four are by the Editor, the Rev. J. S. Burgess, the Rev. W. Whitaker, and the Rev. F. H. Vaughan. We notice in them a strong resemblance of language which rests clearly upon fundamental religious sympathy. Is what they say meant simply to be a cry of discontent and an appeal for better things in the denomination of which they are honoured ministers, or is it a signal of coming secession for the sake of larger liberties and a more positive Christianity? If it is the latter we shall follow their experiment with interest, especially as we foresee the immense difficulties, both religious and intellectual, which will beset their path. If, however, they are bent upon humbler and possibly wiser tasks, may we suggest that they should be more sparing in their use of the language of sacrament and ritual, which lapses so easily into formalism, and dwell a little more upon the unifying power of the spirit of life, which is the common bond of Christian discipleship. The constant use of a special dialect may easily be the cause of imperfect sympathies among men who are really at one in the affections and loyalties of the spiritual life. For the present we are not disposed to quarrel about names, though we observe that the word "Catholic" is used without any strictness—now as the symbol of wholeness and inclusiveness, and again as representing a particular tradition of ritual and sacramental observance. For the glow of conviction which animates all four writers and their resolve to say plainly what they believe, at the risk of some possible misunderstanding on the part of those who are joined with them in common religious work, we have nothing but admiration and respect. But we end as we began with suspense of judgment and a plea for more light.

THE GREEK TRADITION, ESSAYS IN THE RECONSTRUCTION OF ANCIENT THOUGHT. By J. A. K. Thompson, with a preface by Professor Gilbert Murray. London: George Allen & Unwin, Ltd., 5*s.* net.

MR. THOMPSON belongs to the new school of the humanists, which is doing its best to make the Greek spirit intelligible to ordinary men and to restore Greek studies to the affection of all who value literature. It must be confessed that Greek has suffered many things at the hands of scholars, who have chosen some of the world's greatest writers for their own and warned all rash intruders off their chosen preserve. Most authors cease to be read with humanity and intelligence when they are surrendered in this way to criticism or the base uses of examination. They lie buried under a vast weight of commentary, and an opinion is diligently fostered that the only way to understand them is by reading all that the dull pedants of the world have written about them. It is the business of the humanist boldly to break with this tradition, and to summon imagination and the divining power of sympathy to his aid. He must, of course, be a learned man, able to meet the pedant in the gate, or he will be quickly chased off the field. But it is no shame to him if it is the substance of a book which interests him more than its text, and much of his energy is devoted to interpreting it to the common mind instead of engaging in the warfare of scholars. Among living Grecians of this sort Professor Gilbert Murray is facile princeps. The words of commendation which he has written for Mr. Thompson's book will ensure for it many readers, for they are a guarantee that here is work in which he recognises something kindred to his own. The essays themselves are fresh and stimulating and range over a wide field of literature for their illustrations. It is not necessary to read them in the order in which they appear. We suggest that the one on Greek Country Life should be taken first. It is a fascinating experiment in reconstruction based upon Hesiod, Aristophanes and Theocritus. From these the reader may pass on to 'The Springs of Poetry' and 'Some Thoughts on Translation,' two essays which are unusually rich in their allusions to modern literature and succeed in this way in creating the atmosphere of familiarity and expectancy, in which the mind begins to enjoy reading for its own sake. We shall thus be prepared to take up the studies, like those on Thucydides and Lucretius, which cover a more limited field. We cannot here go into any criticism of detail. It is Mr. Thompson's literary method which attracts us. In its purpose it seems to us essentially sound. In his hands a Greek writer becomes part of the literature of the world, touching the lives of all of us who care for noble art at innumerable points, and Greek as a subject for examinations vanishes into the background.

THIS slender volume is one of the fragile mementoes of the war, which owes its existence to the fact that the writer had many friends and had been a striking figure in the literary coterie in which she moved. It will be valued chiefly for the memorial sketch by Mr. Stephen Gwynn, the intimate friend to whom the letters were addressed, though some readers will feel that everything is too much coloured by his almost worshipful admiration. In themselves the letters are not remarkable. They are of the racy, intimate kind, with a touch of the unfamiliar and the adventurous, such as hundreds of people must have written since the beginning of the war. The three months in a Serbian hospital, which closed with her death, can hardly be described as the deliberate acceptance of sacrifice by Mrs. Dearmer; for she went out without preparation or training of any kind in obedience to a momentary impulse. If her husband had remained quietly in his parish it is more than likely that she would have chosen to go on writing plays and enjoying her garden at home; for her attitude to the war was of such a kind that she felt little of its fiery challenge to her noblest instincts. Referring to the sinking of the Lusitania she confesses that she is no more capable of being angry with Germany than with an earthquake, a kind of non-moral fatalism, which has little help in it for the world. It is one of the minor tragedies of the war that a woman of her opulent artistic sensibilities should have met her death in loneliness and discomfort while engaged upon an adventure which it is difficult to believe satisfied all her heart. This volume is her memorial. It will be valued for its personal touches by those who have taken delight in her books and plays, and with a more intimate understanding by her friends.

RELIGION AND DHARMA. By Sister Nivedita (Margaret E. Noble). London: Longmans, Green & Co., 2*s.* 6*d.* net.

THE good work accomplished by Sister Nivedita, among others, in the name of that larger patriotism which is affecting great changes in the relations existing between the various parts of the Empire, can scarcely be estimated at its full value in this country as yet. The problems that await solution in India are many and complex, but they have not really gripped the English imagination, and only those who are attempting to make an intelligent study of them can appreciate the patient labours of those pioneers of reform who have striven so hard to bring East and West into more living communion with each other. In the course of a series of articles contributed to the Modern Review of Calcutta, and now published under the title 'Religion and Dharma,' some indication is given of the methods adopted by Sister Nivedita and the enthusiasm which animated her. Fragmentary as they are, often rapidly written amidst great pressure of work, they well repay careful reading by the student who wishes to be informed as concisely as possible what religious ideas are behind the new nationalist movement in India. A "wakeful and fresh intellect" which has had its training in the West, and, later on, come under the spell of the soul of the East as interpreted by its noblest teachers, is a very good medium for the exchange of ideas between the India that is becoming self-conscious and articulate, and the ruling race to which she is bound by strong ties of allegiance. Perhaps the translation of the Sanskrit word Dharma as National Righteousness, though it conveys a very concrete thought to the English mind, hardly exhausts its meaning as it is understood by a Hindu; but Sister Nivedita's vigorous handling of the whole subject of the relation of the individual to his motherland was intended to counteract the elements of passivity and mental inertia which she recognised as deterrent forces on the path of progress. She knew there were other dangers to be faced, perhaps even worse. She had no wish, for instance, to see the land for which she hoped so much turned into "a pale copy of America." On the other hand, she desired absolute freedom for the liberalising, aspiring spirit in its fearless march to a future radiant with promise, and to the task of stimulating and purifying a wide-spread movement which may have momentous results she gave her best energies and most fervent faith. Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe contributes a sympathetic preface to this useful little volume.

THE CHURCH AND THE NEW KNOWLEDGE. By E. M. Caillard. London, Longmans, 2*s.* 6*d.* net.)

THIS volume of the "Layman's Library" is well worth reading. Its language is always clear and forceful and kindles at times into real eloquence with the intensity of the author's thought and feeling. "The Church" is for her the Anglican one, and it is evident that she accepts the doctrines of her own communion, though in no slavish and unquestioning spirit. The 'New Knowledge' is not the results of the Higher Criticism, about which she says little, but the light which modern research has thrown on the psychology and ethics of religion. Thus we have chapters on such subjects as "Heredity and Environment," "The Ascendancy of Mind over Body," "Suggestion and the Subconscious Mind," "Intimations of an Order Beyond that of Nature," subjects which are of interest to all thoughtful people whether of the Anglican or of any other denomination.

The Essex Hall Year-Book for 1916 bears welcome signs upon it of the care which the Rev. Copeland Bowie has given to its compilation. The changes in typography are a distinct improvement, and will be welcomed by those who use the lists of ministers and congregations constantly for reference. The names of 365 Ministers and 9 Lay Workers in Great Britain and Ireland, and 15 Ministers in the British Dominions across the seas are included. Of these 264 Ministers and 9 Lay Workers are in charge of Congregations, while 72 Ministers have retired from active service. 54 Ministers are stated to have had no college training for their work, a percentage which it will be agreed is far too high, without casting any slur upon the excellence of the work which is done by many untrained men with a native gift for ministry. Lay preaching has increased considerably in recent years. At present nearly 50 congregations on the list rely upon this form of service. Another interesting fact which might be made the subject of a good deal of interesting comment, is that 60 ministers were trained for the ministry in other denominations. This feature is of comparatively recent date, and may be accounted for by the disturbed condition of theological thought. While it has had the advantage of introducing new blood and fresh points of view, it has probably led to a weakening of cohesion in the ministry as a whole. (London, at Essex Hall, 1*s.* net.)

THE following letters will be of special interest to our readers, the first from a Military Convalescent Depôt, the other from a school for Belgian refugee children.

I.

January 4, 1916.

MADAME,—May the New Year bring you as much happiness as you have brought to others! Thanks to your Society, our convalescents are now in much greater comfort. At Christmas time we visited the wards,—what happiness to see the improvement in their condition, what good beds they now have and how they enjoy them! One of them said to me, "Formerly when eight o'clock struck we were all so unwilling to go to bed; now we go with alacrity." Madame, I thank you for having made your way into our country to sow joy and comfort among our dear brave Belgians. May England be blessed for the help she has given.

II.

January 3, 1916.

DEAR MADAME,—Mr. Kelland, the representative of the Belgian Hospital Fund, came yesterday to visit our "colonie scolaire" here. We have 212 boys between the ages of three and fifteen under the direction of a Belgian chaplain and twenty-one nuns. Mr. Kelland gave us permission to tell you what our dear children want most, for in spite of good quarters here and help given us by our devoted government their needs are still many. One must have had charge of a large number of little boys to realise all their needs. Frankly, then, Madame, boots and shoes are the first requirements, then come shirts, waistcoats, knickerbockers, &c.; for they wear them out very fast, in spite of constant mendings, and though we work from morning till night, using up every scrap of old material, still it is difficult to make things go round. Towels are also much needed. Pardon me, dear lady, for sending so long a list for our dear Belgian children, who before the destruction of their own homes enjoyed all the comforts of family life. We are not importunate, Madame, but the smallest gift will be accepted with gratitude; anything will be useful for the children. We leave the decision to you, we know that the English love the Belgians, and we love the English warmly and are full of gratitude to them.

As I am in the place of a mother to these children, may I, as such, add that a little chocolate would be such a pleasure to them? They are only children and love a little treat.

The nuns are also my children and are in want of new robes, and some black serge and underlinen would also be very welcome; but if this is not possible, do not think of it again, but only of the needs of the boys, who are the hope of our poor country, and on whom we love to lavish all our care.

A thousand thanks again, dear Madame, to all our English friends.—Yours most gratefully,

MILL HILL CHAPEL, LEEDS.

THE following letter of greeting for the New Year has been addressed by the Rev. R. Nicol Cross to his congregation at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds:—

New Barracks,
Limerick, Dec. 28, 1915.

MY DEAR PEOPLE,—Again we stand at the gateways of the year and greet each other, but not in the familiar way. It is not happiness I wish you, for who cares about mere happiness to-day? I wish you constancy, fortitude, heroism of heart in the face of the things to come. We have lived in sunny times and known bright hours; we have drunk nectar at the springs of human existence, and we are glad. Now the wheel has turned that carries mortal destiny, and our time has come to drink the gall and bitterness of the world. I wish that you may drink it like men, and still with the smile upon your face. There is a fate abroad that has separated nations, torn the flower of our generous youth from the comforts and delights of home and the fair dalliance of love; it has separated me from you for a time. We look not at these things, but at the cause. Some there may be who were not born for such a day; may you be of those who feel the thrill of the great conflict for the great end. May you not be insensible that you are living in the mightiest spasm of this world's history. That is what I wish, that you may be worthy of the rôle of battle and travail, that each one do his duty in this long-drawn terrific hour.

I don't say "Be happy and prosperous;" I say, "Fight your fight with tyranny, inhumanity, wrong!" Let there be peace among men in whom God is well pleased; but God allows no other peace, and when God declares war, shall we not march, be it to defeat or victory? Some may conquer evil by bearing it; we shall conquer it by slaying it, by showing to gods and men that it were better to break men's mortal bodies than to break the everlasting Commandments. "Arma, Virumque Cano," I sing to the youths who stand through weary vigils in the mud-ruts of France, and sleep their nervous sleep in holes of the earth. The impregnable magnificence of man is upon them, like a preternatural splendour, lighting up the openings of the year.

I wish for you women, too, that you may be dry-eyed, tight-lipped. You have seen your boys and your girls go out to face anything, and you never knew them till they went. In the epiphany of war they stand revealed. Let come what will, they are in your heart and God's, what never a thousand years of peace would have made them.

If you must weep, weep in the silence; if you must bow your head, bow it in the night; but firm lip and dry eye, and a face with the passion of pride writ deep on it is for the day. Shall the mothers of Rome and Sparta stand above the mothers of England?

To the men who have gone from Mill Hill and to the girls who have followed to nurse them in their sore need I can only send a united message of good cheer and an assurance of our unbounded admiration and gratitude, feelings that only grow stronger as this grim contest lengthens. Some of them have gone to the long peace, after the short, sharp agony, borne out to the sound of the twilight and evening bell; not harsh the music death makes for them, beyond our praise, but held in sleepless memory. Most still remain, still fight and watch, still laugh and shiver at the round of Titan's work, crawling on the mouth of Avernus. God nerve them, and bring them through; but if they be cast into the ground and die, God make rich and red the fruitage.

I must be forgiven if, amid these tremendous national happenings, I only touch the ecclesiastical and the personal. There is no Church but the nation when the nation's cause is sacred, and there is nothing personal when the future of humanity is at stake. But since I joined the R.A.M.C. and left you, you have been very generous to me and mine. You have made provision against the extreme lot, you have sought to brighten a Christmas in barracks, and enabled me to have a brighter at home; in various little ways the bonds of affection between Minister and people have been strengthened. At the beginning of the year I again commend to you the Church and its welfare and work, next to the crucial exigencies of this war. A Church without a free state would be robbed of its body, a free state without a Church would one day be deprived of its soul. Let each one, then, face his responsibility in this affair. An hour once a week at Mill Hill is not as bad as an hour's inspection on the barrack yard at Limerick, neither is it so uncomfortable, I imagine, as a week in the trenches.

Whether it be peace or war, at home or on service, let our motto for the year be to do our duty and make some sacrifice, or only face some inconvenience, to hand on to those who come after us the things without which human life is not human, and even freedom has no worth.

Your Minister,
R. NICOL CROSS,
Lce.-Cpl., R.A.M.C.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

THE Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society sustained a great loss in the death of the President, Sir T. Fowell Buxton, in October, for he had been a whole-hearted supporter of the cause of Native Races for which it stands since 1883, and, as President—a position which he had occupied since 1899,—he spared neither time nor trouble in consideration of all the varied matters which came before him. The Anti-Slavery Reporter for January contains a portrait of Sir Fowell Buxton, an interesting memoir of his life, and a selection of press notices which bear ample witness to the high respect in which he was held, not only by those who were best able to estimate his public work, but by all with whom he came in contact. The following extract from the South Wales Daily News strikes us as particularly happy :—"Apart from his own work, the name of Fowell Buxton is one impossible to mention without the memory of fights well won, of patience in adversity, of high courage, and of an unselfishness by which, as Sir George Trevelyan has said very finely in speaking of Sir Thomas's grandfather and his associates, 'These men, who while the struggle lasted were prodigal of health and ease, in the day of triumph disclaimed each for himself even that part of the merit which their religion allowed them to ascribe to human effort and self sacrifice.' That may stand very well for all the Buxtons, and not least for Sir Thomas and his sons, who have done so much for the people of the Balkans. Sir Thomas died in a dark hour for the cause which he held dear, but he may have seen a vision beyond these outcries—a vision hidden, for the present, from our eyes." Sir Victor Buxton, who shared in a very large measure his father's ideals and interests, and has travelled widely in Africa and elsewhere, has been elected to succeed him as President of the Anti-Slavery Society.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bristol.—Much sympathy will be felt for the Rev. A. N. and Mrs. Blatchford in the sad bereavement which they have sustained by the death of their only daughter, Mrs. Mortimer, wife of Fleet-Surgeon Mortimer, R.N. (retired), which took place at Torrington on the 5th of this month. One of the reasons which induced Mr. and Mrs. Blatchford to settle in Bideford, on their removal from Bristol, was the prospect of being near their daughter, who had been in ill-health for some time.

Hull.—A cordial welcome was extended to the Rev. T. M. Falconer, the new minister of the Park Street Unitarian Church, and his wife, by the members of the congregation on January 4. The gathering took place in the church schoolroom. Alderman E. Hanger, J.P., presided, and extended a welcome on behalf of the church. He remarked that one minister stayed fifty years, another twenty years, a third sixteen years, a fourth thirteen years, and since then the ministries of different pastors had averaged about four years. Park Street had become a stepping-stone to higher places, and they could congratulate the church on that fact. As a church, he said, they were very tolerant of differences of opinion, but they stood very strongly for fact. They were Unitarians on a Christian basis, and they were supported by men of high rank as regarded character, ability, and scholarship. They looked upon God as their father and upon man as their brother, and in the future there was no doubt there would be great room for this and all churches to bring about a better condition of life. Mr. W. Bailey Holmes, who has been associated with the Sunday School for thirty-eight years, voiced a welcome on behalf of that department of the church and the Literary and Social Union. He said it was nearly one hundred years since the Sunday school was started, and it was amongst the first to be opened. Mrs. W. F. Harris spoke on behalf of the Ladies' Societies, and Mr. James Downs, Mr. W. J. Strachan and Mrs. Scott also took part. The Rev. T. B. Howell, in a fraternal greeting, said he had long thought it was one of the disasters of the Free Churches that they should consent to the severance of their unity because of a highly metaphysical and speculative theory of the person of Christ. They could all subscribe to the term of "the lordship of Christ" rather than spend their life like their metaphysical ancestors in spinning webs for theological students to unravel. The Rev. G. Borrow was equally cordial in his welcome. The Rev. T. M. Falconer, who comes to Hull from Glasgow, in reply, said he would endeavour to carry out the excellent traditions of the church. He accepted the right hand of fellowship so generously held out to him by Mr. Howell and Mr. Borrow. They could do more good together than if they trod their own solitary paths. If there ever was a time when differences in Christianity should be sunk it was now. They should stand shoulder to shoulder to resist the common enemy. He was thrusting great and solemn tasks upon the churches. Nations could not concentrate their energies upon self-destruction without doing enormous injury to the moral and spiritual nature of man. It was upon the high moral and spiritual nature of human beings that we depended for the progress, happiness, and peace of the world. The Church had the power to create that sentiment and public opinion that would make wars in the future impossible.

Mansfield.—A United Service of Intercession was held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall on the last day of the old year at 12 noon. The Mayor and Corporation attended officially, and a very large congregation assembled. In response to an appeal from the Mayor most of the shops were closed from 12 till 2. The 'Order of Service' was printed, and consisted simply of prayers, hymns and scripture readings, with no sermon. The Rev. F. J. Adams (Vicar of St. Peter's), the Rev. J. Leonard Webber (Wesleyan), the Rev. W. J. McAdam (Congregationalist), the Rev. W. Lilley (Vicar of St. John's), and the Rev. C. M. Wright (Minister of the Old Meeting House), took part in the service.

Nantwich.—During last week there was held in the various Nonconformist places of worship in the town a series of United Prayer Meetings. That at the Unitarian Chapel on Saturday night was well attended, representatives being present from all the denominations. These gatherings were followed on the Sunday evening by an exchange of pulpits. The Unitarian minister (the Rev. J. Park Davies) officiated at the Primitive Methodist Chapel, whereas his place at home was taken by the Baptist minister. After the services were over there was held in the Wesleyan Church a United Communion Service, in which all the ministers participated. The noble spirit of fellowship and genuine religion which was manifested throughout has produced on all that were privileged to be present a profound and, it is to be hoped, a lasting impression.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE SHAKESPEARE TERCENTENARY.

Prof. Gollancz explains in a letter to The Times that, although there will be during the war no celebration of the Shakespeare Tercentenary on the lines contemplated the summer before last, arrangements are being made for a very simple and dignified observance of the occasion in a manner consonant with the mood of the nation under present conditions. It is suggested that the churches, if the leaders approve, should (as is annually the practice at the birthplace) on Sunday, April 30 (April 23 being Easter Sunday in 1916), pay the tribute of veneration for Shakespeare and all that he stands for; that the actors, if they so desire and are willing fraternally to co-operate, should arrange for a special performance of one of the plays—and it would be well if the performance should prove a means of aiding the profession by affording some substantial assistance to the large number of its members in dire straits, owing to the war; that Stratford-on-Avon, now depleted of its crowds of pilgrims from all parts of the world, should on this occasion be very specially remembered as the shrine of England's primacy through Shakespeare in the world of intellect; and that the lessons of patriotism—now more than ever to be inculcated—should be deepened in the hearts of the younger generation by reminding the school-children, throughout the Empire, of Shakespeare's ideals as patriot and Englishman. It might also be a good thing if in 1916 Empire Day could be made to synchronise with Shakespeare Day (May 3, according to the new style).

AN ITALIAN PATRIOT OF 1849.

Tommaso Salvini, in his day regarded as one of the greatest actors of modern times, who has just died at Florence, aged eighty-seven, fought under Garibaldi in the Italian War of Independence. Although exposed to much danger he escaped uninjured, but was subjected to a good deal of annoyance afterwards as a result of his devotion to the national cause, and was twice imprisoned, though only for a few days in each case. A writer in the Manchester Guardian gives some instances of the way in which, as an actor also, he was made to feel the power of a reactionary censorship. Words related, however remotely, to religion were ruthlessly cut out of the text. Other words, too, such as Tartuffe, unity, purple, French, foreigner, patriot, were also banned. That the Italian colours (red, white, and green) should be proscribed one can easily understand, but on one occasion Salvini was banned because a blue uniform with red facing looked green by artificial light. During Salvini's memorable visit to London in 1875, he achieved a great personal triumph, and was received everywhere in a manner befitting a great artist. "I set out from London," he says, recalling these experiences, "leaving behind me innumerable pleasant acquaintances, friendships that I can never forget, and with a profound affection for a young orphan who the same year became my wife."

THE "KING'S AFRICAN RIFLES."

Miss Alice Werner, who always writes with sympathy and understanding of the native races in Africa with which she is so familiar, has described in the Daily News the character of the tribesmen who make up the "King's African Rifles," formerly known as the "Central African Regiment." It is often thought that these men are of the type who care for war more than for anything else, but this, says Miss Werner, is not so; they find no difficulty in returning to civil life after their three years' service, and apparently there are few re-enlistments. They are sturdy men, "dour mountaineers," with a strong vein of obstinacy which makes them the bane of the wrong sort of planter, yet full of lovable qualities when you know them and have won their trust, and faithful unto death to those who are their friends, as many instances testify. In the year of King Edward's Coronation some of these men came over to this country, and if we may judge from the letter which "No. 88 Interpreter C. Company," otherwise Wilson Malindima, of Domasi, wrote at the time, England (and, presumably, the fireworks at the Crystal Palace), made a great impression upon them. "This is a very good country indeed," says the Interpreter; "yesterday we saw many truly terrible things; fire came out of the ground and passed up into the sky, making a noise like cannon going off, and very many people were assembled, women, children, and men, who danced most wonderfully, and many dogs, who danced and leapt like human beings. Truly, the Europeans surpass all people; but we know that their cleverness comes from God."

AGREEING TO DIFFER.

An excellent story which comes from the front is narrated by the Manchester Guardian. An Anglican chaplain and an Irish Roman Catholic priest, working together among the soldiers, had been drawn together by the necessity for mutual arrangements and assistance. Later, when separated, they exchanged letters, and from union in secular arrangements their correspondence extended to questions of spiritual community. At last the Irish priest wrote that he did not think that their correspondence could profitably go further in this line, adding, "It should be enough that we are both working for the same end and for the same Master—you in your way and we in His."

SWINBURNE RELICS FOR THE NATION.

By the will of Miss Isabel Swinburne, the British Museum becomes possessed of a bound volume of the MSS. of 'A Century of Roundels,' and the MSS. of all works, both of prose and verse, by her brother, Algernon Swinburne. To the National Portrait Gallery is bequeathed George Richmond's portrait of the poet at the age of six or seven, with his sisters, which was exhibited in the Royal Academy in 1845, and has never, apparently, been reproduced. This will supplement the portrait of Swinburne by G. F. Watts already in the Gallery which represents him at the age of twenty-eight.

LIVINGSTONE'S GRAVE.

Lecturing at the Parochial Hall, Forest Gate, last week, Mrs. Livingstone Wilson, only surviving child of David Livingstone, the explorer, described her recent journey to Old Chitambo in the heart of the bush, north-east of Rhodesia, where her father's heart was buried. An old chief called Chitend, from another village, claimed that it was in his mother's hut that Dr. Livingstone died, and four other old men, who refused to believe that Mrs. Wilson was Dr. Livingstone's daughter—"He had no child with him; he always came alone," they said—remembered him and told of him through the interpreter. The discrepancies between their version and that of the biographers were, Mrs. Wilson said, of great interest. The old chief's claim that Dr. Livingstone died in his mother's hut arose from the fact that, while his followers had gone ahead to build him a grass hut, he became so ill that he had to rest under the eaves of a native hut, dying afterwards in the grass one that had been built for him.

* * * * *

The old men declared that they remembered his followers building a stockade round the hut while they embalmed the body in salt and brandy, burying the heart under a great tree, at the other side of which old Chitambo, the chief of the village, who had had a great respect for the explorer, was afterwards buried. The explorer's body, as is well known, was borne a thousand miles through the forest to be sent to England by his faithful native followers. Jacob Wainwright, the best known of these, had asked the old chief to keep the grass always burned close around the tree at Chitambo, so that it might escape the dangers of forest fires. Afterwards the tree was struck by lightning, and the present memorial, in sloping brick with a cross at the summit—the slope being made to prevent elephants brushing their trunks against it—was erected in the bush with an avenue cleared in front of it. Here was placed a book on which big-game hunters and explorers who penetrated thus far might note their names; this book was stolen, however, and Mrs. Wilson, as she said in a recent letter in The Times, is anxious that anyone who has signed it should communicate with her.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE wish that we could provide our readers every week with some human document from the places in France where their benevolent activities are in full swing; but posts are intermittent, and there is a certain monotony even in the life of a Belgian Hospital. We know and appreciate to the full the value of the personal touch. It has been the secret of our wonderful success so far. The letters which reach us continually from all over the country show how deeply it has been felt. It is helping real people, not merely contributing to a fund which interests us and makes generosity a form of religious service. We have received our usual reports from France this week. Numerous hospitals have again been visited, and more than one doctor has sent a message of enthusiastic gratitude for the splendid help. The work for the refugee children to which we drew special attention last week, is well in hand and many working parties have made a fine response to our appeal.

IT is particularly gratifying to note the growing interest in the work on the part of local Associations and a desire to identify themselves with it. Meetings have been arranged by the Manchester District Branch of the Women's League, the East Cheshire Christian Union, the Southern Unitarian Association, and the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association; and the campaign will also be carried into South Wales and the North of Ireland. There is nothing like the flame of divine charity to create a union of hearts. It destroys walls of partition; it makes men tolerant of differences; it creates an atmosphere of mutual understanding. We hope that when the war is over we shall find that we have all been drawn closer together not only by the discipline of sorrow, but also by our efforts to be helpful and kind.

As we go to press the newspapers are full of conflicting rumours about Montenegro. After circumstantial accounts of her surrender and the terms to be imposed by Austria, coupled with ominous rumours of treachery, it is now stated that the King and his high officials have fled to Italy, while the army, refusing to lay down its arms, has taken to the mountains. It was certainly hard to believe that a simple and high-spirited people would ever accept conditions which were not merely harsh but ignominious. In any case the rejoicings in Austria and Germany have been premature, and the Central Powers may live to repent of their folly in revealing with such brutal frankness their intention of riding rough-shod over small nations as soon as they think they have them safely in their power.

THE Military Service Bill has made good progress in the House of Commons this week. There has been no undue haste, and intelligent criticism has been met with courtesy; but it has not been forgotten that prolonged discussion would be unseemly while the country is at war. At the same time the Government has recognised that the very word "compulsion" is full of embarrassment for the English mind and cuts clean across many traditional ideas about personal liberty. We think that even the keenest objector, who would almost go so far as to risk the military situation in order to get the bill thrown out, must admit that there has been fair and open debate and a genuine desire to make the unwelcome element of compulsion as little galling as possible.

IT is, perhaps, a little difficult at present to examine with any calmness of mind the meaning of individual liberty. To what extent may the citizen accept the privileges of citizenship and refuse the burdens which the majority of his fellow-citizens regard as necessary for the common safety? Is there a point where the will of the conscientious objector must be overborne lest in clinging to the shadow of liberty we should lose the substance? Most of us have little inclination to solve our difficulties by abstract argument just now. The public mind is swayed by what it regards as the implicit reasonableness of the situation, which is one of danger calling for strong and determined action. This point of view was put with blunt force by the Labour member, Mr. Barnes, on Wednesday night. After visiting France, he said, where he had found men grappling with grim realities, he regretted to return to an atmosphere permeated with long drawn-out wire-drawn dissertations on liberty. Liberty for what? Liberty to weaken the State? Liberty to desert one's friends and champions? We were fighting this war for a larger liberty, for the liberty of each which would be consistent with the liberty of all.

WE think that in present circumstances the plea of Mr. Barnes is entirely sound; but the thoughtful man will have to return later on to his theory of liberty and ask himself how far it fits the facts, not only the old facts, but the new facts which the war has revealed. The present situation has simply brought to a head a tendency to break away from hard-shell individualism, which has engaged the attention of careful observers of religion and politics for a long time. The traditional doctrine of personal freedom, which most of us have inherited, rests in part at least upon the crude assumption that one man's thought is as good as another's, and every conscience being in lonely dependence upon God must go its own way. Of course this might lead to universal chaos; but we have usually managed to get rid of the extravagances of the conscientious objector by the steady pressure of social discipline. We have expected all decent men to pay their taxes and obey the laws. In this we have not been disappointed, and for all practical purposes we can ignore the problem of those who say that it is against their conscience.

Now our present difficulty arises from the fact that military service is a new issue. English people have not grown up with the belief that readiness to defend one's country is one of the fundamental decencies of social life. If they were French democrats their attitude would be quite different, and we believe that three out of four of our present conscientious objectors would feel no difficulty about the matter at all. In other words the personal conscience would conform here, as it does in a hundred other ways, to the larger and more instructed social will. This is a mere hint in regard to some of the unsolved problems of social duty and organisation, which lie ahead of us. We shall be glad to give some space in our columns to their discussion, if there is any inclination to explore them further from the point of view both of citizenship and religion.

A VERY illuminating letter on the French military system by Mr. Rowland E. Prothero appeared in The Times on Tuesday. He lays stress on a fact, which is often ignored when we are engaged in denouncing what we vaguely call militarism, that a national army is exactly what a nation makes of it. Conscription in Germany and in France yields entirely different results because the political traditions and the national ideals are different.

> A national army [he says] raised on the system of universal military service may belong to the German or the French type. Its character is determined by the ideals, the institutions, the social organisation of the country in which the obligation is enforced. It may be, as in Germany, the badge of personal slavery, fostering militarism, and inspiring aggression. It may be, as in France, the badge of personal freedom, securing the victory of democratic principles, and guaranteeing the triumph of industrial ideals. If ever a national army was raised in this country on the basis of universal military service, it is beyond all possible question that its character would approximate to the French model.

A LETTER by Sir Alfred Booth in The Times on Wednesday illustrates the extraordinary intricacy of our commercial arrangements and the effect of the continued demand for luxuries upon the price of the necessaries of life. Owing to the shortage of tonnage there is continual competition among cargoes for the privilege of being carried, and with the best organisation we cannot make sixty-seven ships do the work of 100. His suggestion that luxuries should be cut off at the source as a measure of national safety would involve a drastic interference with ordinary business; but it is difficult to see how the primary need of an adequate supply of necessaries at a reasonable price can be secured in any other way.

> It is manifest [he writes] that we cannot hope to go on importing all the cargoes for which we find uses in times of peace. The problem is what cargoes shall we do without. If every industry in the country is determined to do its utmost to carry on business as usual, and if every individual in the country is determined to do his best to live in the same degree of comfort as in times of peace, then we must put up with high prices and high freights; as it is only by the forcing up of prices and freights that the rival claimants on our reduced ocean carrying power can determine what cargoes are to be brought and what shut out. The only possible alternative policy is for the State to prohibit the importation of all cargoes other than those necessary to the successful conduct of the war and to the existence of the nation. There is ample tonnage left available to carry our war supplies, our essential food supplies, and the raw material required for our more important industries, but not to maintain a peace standard of business activity or of personal comfort.

WE need hardly say that we are entirely at one with Prof. Gilbert Murray in his protest on behalf of freedom of speech in the Daily News. His words are all the more valuable because it is well known that he has no sympathy with pacifist propaganda. It is the clear duty of the police to preserve the peace among civilians until their duties are taken from them by the military authorities. It is not contrary to law to express unpopular opinions. It is contrary to law to break up meetings with a display of ruffianism. The offence is aggravated when the ruffian invades a private building, like a Friends' Meeting House, which has been lent for the purpose: Prof. Murray takes up an impregnable position when he says that it is for the Government to prohibit all meetings of the Union of Democratic Control, or to give them adequate protection. Wherever there is danger to the public interest the appeal must be to the Defence of the Realm Act and not to the will of the mob. In saying this we have no wish to exaggerate the importance of what has taken place. Against a few displays of hooliganism and wild spirits, there is the shining record of the nation, which has shown admirable patience, good temper and self-control, often under very trying circumstances, since the beginning of the war.

THERE are numerous signs that we are beginning to take to heart the weakening of our national life for many high purposes of fellowship and duty owing to what it has become the fashion to call "our unhappy divisions." In politics lines of cleavage have disappeared, not before many of them had become unreal, and men who formerly never met without accentuating their differences now unite in devotion to a common national ideal. In religion the same thing is taking place, though circumstances have not forced us to face a clear issue as in the case of the coalition Government. Probably all definite proposals for re-union are still premature. The churches need to be flooded first of all with new experience, with richer sympathies, with larger understanding. There is a ferment of life going on around us. Our attitude towards religion is being deeply modified; it is less critical, less theological than it was. Merely denominational aims seem less significant than they were, as we stand silent in presence of the heroism and the sorrow of the world. These things must be allowed to deal with us in their own way for a time, and men must have the courage to follow the good instincts of their hearts in the simplicity of true brotherly affection without laying down terms of agreement. Out of it all there will come fresh groupings and a closer sense of union amid the differenees of religious temperament. We can hardly go further than this prophetic hope at present, for the way is only just beginning to open out before us, and we have still so many things to learn.

RAEMAEKERS' CARTOONS.

THE rooms of the Fine Art Society in New Bond Street have surely never welcomed such a series of pictures, so ghastly in their realism, so bitter in their sardonic wit, as these cartoons by Louis Raemaekers. It is curious to watch the crowd of spectators. Some of them are the habitués of Bond Street exhibitions, eager to examine and criticise the drawing and the restrained but most effective use of colour. Others go about, catalogue in hand, doing the show which has suddenly become the talk of the town. But many are speechless, for horror and a pity too deep for words have clutched at their vitals. For a brief hour they are in the hands of a man of genius who does with them what he will. They cannot escape from his mocking laughter, his gigantic scorn, and the unfathomable tenderness of his sorrow. When they go out into the dark and rain-swept streets, a procession of slaughtered children, and agonised mothers who cannot even find relief in tears, and men who were dragged from their homes to be tortured and slain though they had done no wrong, seems to surround and engulf them; while leering round every corner is the gross figure of the German war-god, with the fat smile of insatiable cruelty on his lips and the unholy legend "Gott mit uns" to justify all his deeds. And it is not a nightmare! They have simply seen the truth, the naked realities of the war, and the unclean spirit against which we are fighting.

Mr. Raemaekers is a Dutch artist. Before the war he was little known outside his own country. His chief delight is in the painting of landscapes, though it is his political cartoons which have attracted public notice. Mr. Clutton-Brock, who has written a preface to the catalogue of the Bond Street Exhibition, points out that he has a power of design which the ordinary cartoonist often lacks. "He draws a scene as if he had actually seen it, not as if he had invented it to express some idea of his own. His method is that of one who takes swift notes from reality; and it does not matter that he has seen the reality only with his mind's eye. He is able to see it so, to make these vivid images, because he has studied the real world and kept precise memories of it." It is these rare gifts of realistic imagination which have been kindled to a white heat by the events of the war. Many of his cartoons still deal with the internal politics of Holland. The sentimental pacifist, the comfortable shirker, the man who pities Belgium but wants to keep on good terms with Germany for the sake of trade, none of them escape undamaged from his remorseless satire. But it is when he deals directly with the incidents of the war, the atrocities in Belgium or the crimes of the Zeppelin and the submarine against non-combatants, that he speaks to the conscience of the world. There is a terrible impartiality about it all. He is not making out a case for England or the Allies. We feel that if we acted in the same way he would not be slow to crucify us with his scorn. There is even a trace of pity in his attack upon the German ambition to dominate the world. There has been no more powerful exposure of the futility of what Germany has achieved than the picture called 'The Letter,' and yet it is brimful of human feeling. It represents a German trench. In the foreground a bright lad is sitting. He is writing a letter home. He looks up for a moment, resting his face on his hand, with eyes that tell you he sees what he dares not say. He has just written the words: "Dear Mother, we have gained a good bit: our cemeteries now extend as far as the sea."

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have done a public service by publishing reproductions of forty of these cartoons in a pamphlet for twopence. We should like to see them in every English home. They will revive our memories. They will renew our strength. They come just at an opportune moment when many people are getting a little too much accustomed to the war and lapsing into the apathy which custom and security breed. They will also rebuke the tendency, too manifest in some quarters, to absorption in domestic problems, as though the first thing we have to consider were the protection of our own people from spending too much of their manhood and their wealth in foreign enterprises which only concern them indirectly. We do not believe that this spirit, which we regard as thoroughly destestable in its short-sighted selfishness, will make any real headway among us. We know in our hearts that we have got to suffer and to spend our strength in chivalrous devotion to the world's need to a far greater extent than we have done yet, and we mean to do it. But the first mutterings of the traitor who lurks within must be checked, and our fortitude must be continually renewed by clear vision of the wrong we have to redeem, and of the spiritual treasure for which we fight. Here the artist has a great advantage over the writer, for while the writer can only describe and exhort the painter makes us see. There are three of Mr. Raemaekers' cartoons, which we should like to see reproduced in a large size and displayed on public hoardings all over the country. They are 'The Widows of Belgium,' a crowd of black garbed figures, which cannot be numbered for multitude, with eyes that can weep no more; 'The Mothers of Belgium,' a group of women praying in dumb agony in a church; and 'The Children of Belgium,' a procession of homeless waifs, fleeing from the wrath of a stormlit sky between long rows of black crosses. As we look at them every instinct of chivalry commands us to obey their challenge and to maintain our effort with unimpaired strength till the hard task is done. No true man can be an inert spectator of intolerable wrong.

But why should this wrong have happened to Belgium at all? If any one is inclined to urge that it is partly her fault because she resisted, and all resistance to aggression is short-sighted and wrong, he will find himself in uncomfortable agreement with the German mind, which is still bewildered by the blind insanity of her action. This is a position which Mr. Raemaekers exposes with all the terrible irony at his command. Three prosperous Germans are looking at the murdered figure of Belgia. The one in the middle, who is spectacled and evidently a learned professor, is explaining with sapient fore-finger to the other two the deplorable folly of which she has been guilty. "Why did she not yield? Of course she would have been paid for it." Is it any wonder that

The Cartoons are also in course of publication in a larger form by the Elzevier Press, Amsterdam. Parts 1 to 5 are now ready, price 2/- each. They may be ordered from the Fine Art Society, 148, New Bond Street, or from a bookseller.

Mr. Raemaekers is not popular in Germany? His indictment of lawless violence and base intrigue will stand, long after the war is over, when many of our present controversies and estrangements are forgotten. It is a human document not merely for the present crisis but for the future, for it is the work of one of the world's great satirists, who loves justice and hates cruelty, and has used his matchless gifts of humour and indignation for the protection of the weak and the discomfiture of all proud rebels against justice and pity and the consideration which is due to other men.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE PASSING OF ARTHUR.

AND slowly answer'd Arthur from the barge:
"The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
And God fulfils himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.
Comfort thyself: what comfort is in me?
I have lived my life, and that which I have done
May He within himself make pure! but thou,
If thou shouldst never see my face again,
Pray for my soul. More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore, let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.
But now farewell. I am going a long way
With all thou seest—if indeed I go
(For all my mind is clouded with a doubt)—
To the island-valley of Avilion;
Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies
Deep-meadow'd, happy, fair with orchard lawns
And bowery hollows crown'd with summer sea,
Where I will heal me of my grievous wound."

So said he, and the barge with oar and sail
Moved from the brink, like some full-breasted swan
That, fluting a wild carol ere her death,
Ruffles her pure cold plume, and takes the flood
With swarthy webs. Long stood Sir Bedivere
Revolving many memories, till the hull
Look'd one black dot against the verge of dawn,
And on the mere the wailing died away.

But when that moan had past for evermore,
The stillness of the dead world's winter dawn
Amazed him, and he groan'd, "The King is gone."
And therewithal came on him the weird rhyme,
"From the great deep to the great deep he goes."

PRAYER.

BLESSED be Thy glorious Name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise. Thou, even Thou, art Lord alone. Thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth and all things that are therein; the sea and all that is therein; and Thou preservest them all, and the host of heaven worshippeth Thee. Thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsakest not Thy people. Now, therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, Who keepest covenant and mercy, let not all our weariness seem little before Thee, that hath come upon us, but hear us and bless us; for Thy Name's sake. Amen.

THE CHURCH AND WAR, IN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES.

I.

THE historic relations of the Christian Church to the moral problems of war are not only full of significance for all who are willing to listen to the voices of the ages: they constitute an impressive demonstration of a general principle whose importance can scarcely be overestimated. Our view of the right and wrong of war depends on our view of the State. What is the State? What are the conditions of its existence? What are the grounds of its right to exist? These are the questions which lie at the heart of the moral problems of war; and this is the central principle of the situation.

What was the primitive Christian attitude to the State? Two cardinal facts determined that attitude. In the first place the State was the Imperial Government of Rome. In the second place the primitive Christians inherited the Jewish prophetic hope of an imminent divine intervention, putting an end to the whole existing order of the world, physical and social, and substituting a new order. This conviction lay at the heart of their faith; it penetrated their outlook on life, moulded their activities, and sustained their enthusiasm. And Paul's famous exclamation at the close of his first Corinthian letter Maran atha—afterwards supposed to have been some mysterious kind of curse—seems to have been the watchword of spiritual militancy in the congregations: "Our Lord, come!"

But this conviction permitted more than one view of the State, as the pages of the New Testament show. There was a period when the State was regarded as non-Christian rather than anti-Christian. In the well-known thirteenth chapter of the Roman letter Paul's attitude to the State is one of more than benevolent neutrality, although a few lines further on, in glowing sentences, he rejoices in the thought of the approaching End. In the Book of Acts it is evident that enemies of the Gospel are not the Roman authorities but the emissaries of the Jews. The Roman officials are guilty of acts of oppression and violence at the instigation of Jews; but on the whole the authority of the Government is exercised for the protection of Paul and his friends. The appeal to Cæsar, made by Paul with the utmost confidence, is only one striking illustration out of many. The book seems to show that as a matter of fact there were times when the State protected the churches from the fanaticism of the Jews.

How did this attitude affect the treatment of militarism? The account of the centurion, Cornelius, seems to show that the author of Acts saw no incompatibility between Christianity and the profession of arms. The same author represents John the Baptist as telling the Roman soldiers to abstain from violence and wrongful exactions; in other words, from looting, or in any way ill-treating the civil population. He tells them to be content with their pay; he does not treat the soldiers' profession as in itself wicked. Matthew represents Christ as commending a centurion's faith, irrespective of the fact that the man was an officer in the Roman Army. And the suggestive precept, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's," contained in one of the oldest Gospel sources, implies a recognition of the State which may carry us far.

This was not a possible permanent attitude for the early Church. In the age of Imperial decadence, the age of the great persecutions, the conviction grew that the State was anti-Christ, and that conviction in an intense form, working in a mind of imaginative dramatic genius, produced the book which stands last in our New Testament, and which, in date, is among the first. Mysterious as the book has always seemed, the writer's purpose is plain. He would do for persecuted Christians what the book of Daniel had done for persecuted Jews: confirm the little groups of believers in their faith and patience by urging that the sufferings of the present time will last only for a little time, and that the present troubles are already the beginning of that End when sorrow and suffering will be transformed into glory unspeakable.

The moral teaching arising out of this view of things is pure anarchy as far as any earthly order is concerned. Such a State, such a government, drove men to desperation, and in their desperation they became anarchists—not anarchists of terrorism and violence, but anarchists to this world in the faith and hope of another, and that other, not a distant "heaven," but a transformed earth. Nothing is further from the writer's mind than open rebellion; the war against the diabolic powers embodied in "the world" (the State) is all in the hands of Christ and His angels, not in the hands of men. Man cannot improve the world; all that each one can do is to keep watch over himself. The one thing to which they must not yield: State-worship—the worship of "the beast," that is the Imperial power typified in the Emperor. Beyond that they had only to submit and endure. This passive attitude is reflected in one of the great sayings of the Sermon on the Mount. The evil is not to be resisted because the Almighty is about to destroy it. Christians must not only submit but emphasise their submission by yielding twice as much as was demanded—go two miles instead of one, offer the other cheek when smitten on the one, give the cloak to him who forcibly takes the coat.

When we turn to interrogate the great Fathers of the second century we find this attitude, of the utmost possible detachment from the State, determining moral judgment on all "public questions." It is true that in Justin and Irenæus there is no discussion dealing directly with the moral problems of war. Their references to the duty of abstaining from force, and to the demands of Love are concerned with the immediately personal relations of Christians with their neighbours, and the spiritual glory of martyrdom for the faith is exalted as the highest type of the Christian duty of submission to injury. Still, we may infer that while they would not insist that a soldier should abandon military service on his conversion to Christianity, they would severely discourage a Christian believer from voluntary "enlistment," and, indeed, from most other forms of public service under the State. The significance of this is revealed by Tatian, who declares that political authority, military command, the influence of wealth and fame, are undesirable and are not desired by Christian believers because they involve service of the powers of this world. It would seem that he did not regard military service as in itself worse than other worldly pursuits; all are equally condemned.

Not until we come to Tertullian do we find an explicit treatment of the ethics of war. In unconscious denial of the famous saying from the Gospel which we have quoted, he says that one soul cannot serve two masters—God and Cæsar:—"How can a Christian serve as a soldier even in peace, without a sword which the Lord has taken away? For although soldiers came to John and received a rule to govern their actions, and even though a centurion believed, the Lord afterwards in disarming Peter disarmed every soldier (Matt. xxvi. 52)." Clearly this is to read into the words more than they warrant. It would be more accurate to say—"disarmed every man who uses force against the power of the State even when unjustly exercised"; that is on the assumption (a large one), that any general precept whatever can be derived from this saying. In any case, Tertullian's general way of dealing with militarism in the tract which he devotes to the subject, implies, on the one hand, that he was defending a view more rigorous than the one commonly entertained, and on the other, that his most radical objection to war was that it involved service of the State. Elsewhere, however, when defending Christianity from the charge of hostility to all public order and welfare, he dwells with satisfaction on the fact Christians shared with their non-Christian neighbours in all kinds of public work: "We are but of yesterday, yet we fill every place among you—islands, fortresses, towns, market-places, military camps....We sail with you and fight with you and till the ground with you."

Origen's strong statement of the impossibility of military service for Christians has often been quoted; but it must be remembered that the mutual consistency of his various statements is more than doubtful. He admits that there may be just wars, that the armies engaged in a just war are fighting righteously, and that in such a case Christians may pray for the success of the Imperial arms.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Jackson of Leeds, sees an all-important distinction between compulsory military service and taxation, because the latter "merely takes away (part of) a man's money" while the former "may take a man's life away" and "compel him to take the life of a fellow creature." The distinction is not "all-important." Indeed, there is no distinction of principle at all. Compulsion is there in both cases, and whoso objects to compulsory military service may just as reasonably (or unreasonably) object to be compulsorily taxed in order to pay for military service, compulsory or voluntary, for if such service is wrong, since it implies the possible killing of fellow creatures, then the man who pays taxes to that end is particeps criminis, and logically should refuse to pay taxes. But unfortunately, "curiously enough there are some perverse people in our midst who are not reconciled" to the fact that citizenship obliges, and that the extent and character of their obligation is the extent and character of their country's need. The responsible authorities declare that the country needs the service of every fit man in one capacity or another; and they add that the response to the call for volunteers is inadequate. They would fail in the duty with which the country has charged them if they did not accordingly compel the needed service. And compulsory service in case of need is essentially democratic. Joseph Mazzini, a democrat if ever there was one, says in his essay on 'The Duties of Man': "The sole origin of every Right is in a Duty fulfilled." John Stuart Mill in his essay on 'Liberty'—the textbook of democrats—says: "Every one who receives the protection of society owes a return for the benefit, and the fact of living in society renders it indispensable that each should be bound to observe a certain line of conduct towards the rest. This conduct consists first in not injuring the interests of one another....and, secondly, in each bearing his share (to be fixed on some equitable principle) of the labours and sacrifices incurred in defending the society or its members from injury and molestation. These conditions society is justified in enforcing, at all costs to those who endeavour to withhold fulfilment." And the late Prof. Stanley Jevons in his work, 'The State in Relation to Labour' says: "The liberty of the subject is only the means to an end; it is not itself the end; hence when it fails to produce the desired end, it may be set aside and other means employed."

All honour to voluntaryism. God forbid that I should say a word in its dispraise. But the liberty of the State is more sacred than the liberty of the subject, and so God forbid, too, that I should spare a syllable in condemnation of the creature (I cannot call him a man) who is content to look calmly on while the goddess Liberty is outraged, or who is despicable enough to hire some one else to do the duty that is properly his.—Yours, &c. HAROLD RYLETT.

Tenterden, Kent, January 17, 1916.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Many of your readers cannot but view the present situation with desolation of heart. Fair prospects of universal fraternity have given place to hostility on a grand scale, and warlike preparations on a grander. The time has passed for warding off compulsory military service, but, as you suggest, there is scope for "freshness of thought." If the present war and the subsequent perpetuation of conscription on the Continent demand compulsory military service here, then the people of this country must banish such terms as "militarist" and wholeheartedly embrace the army and navy. The spirit of the nation and the spirit of the services require to be consciously harmonised. A kind of rapprochement is necessary. Civil life needs a greater infusion of discipline, and the barrack-room needs the atmosphere of the average English home. Only let us feel that we are one—not army and nation, but national army—and then "all we have and are" will survive. Just as chivalry emerged from the Dark Ages, so, after this welter of barbarism, we may come to view weapons of warfare as symbols only. I fear the implications of the martial language of our hymns are not adequately grasped, simply because the worshippers have never hazarded their lives. After this present baptism of fire, there is reason to hope that the resultant symbolism will lead to concrete issues. Men who have faced death in the trenches or on the high seas, will not flinch from social and political reform. The warriors will make the best pacifists because they alone will have acquaintance with both the horrors of war and the blessings of peace.—Yours, &c.

'THE FREE CATHOLIC.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your review of The Free Catholic is one which I sincerely welcome, although the proportion of praise in it did not crimson my face with deprecating blushes. I welcome it because it opens an opportunity for explanation which I trust you will permit me, if only as a fairly faithful and quite recent contributor to THE INQUIRER, to take. My most crucial difference from you is on the suggestion that our enterprise is untimely. Everywhere men's hearts are bruised and softened into tenderness by the appalling woes of the war, and a new earnestness has visited the soul of the nation. People who used to be mildly indifferent to Christianity and some who were even hostile, have discovered the meaning of its divine appeal. They have come, wistful and sorrow-stricken, to present themselves before its altars, and learned to bow before the dread and consoling symbol of Sacrifice. And the churches have been drawn together in united work and intercession so that we find to our joy our ever-young friend, Mr. Dowson, preaching in the parish church from which his spiritual ancestors had been exiled, and I, with many others in other towns, have joined in conducting civic services with Anglican bishops and clergy and representative Nonconformist ministers.

It would seem, therefore, a supreme moment to give expression to this growing sentiment of re-union and to do all we can through the pages of The Free Catholic, and in every other generous way, to fuse the existing sectional movements into a freer and more catholic co-operation. Our desire is to weld the iron while it is hot, not to hammer it vainly when it is once more hard and cold. Not to do this now would be to incur the grave guilt of ignoring an opportunity that may never come again in our lives.

Nor are we alone in thus reading the signs of the times. If you follow The Christian World and other religious newspapers, you will see that the desire for unity is a leaven at work everywhere. Various proposals, such as that of the Rev. Harold Brierley for a "United Free Church," are being offered for consideration. I disagree with the dreary anti-Anglican political animus of that particular scheme, but I share the conviction that now is the time for discussing and planning. Especially is it so for those of us who are acutely apprehensive of the danger of consolidating wrong elements on wrong principles and of more deeply entrenching our unhappy divisions. Hence the appearance at this time of The Free Catholic in which we offer our humble contribution to a Christian settlement of some of our quarrels.

With you, I regret the smallness of our periodical; but we prefer to begin modestly rather than plunge ambitiously into something quite beyond our power to sustain, only to be compelled to do what nearly all the religious papers (not excepting THE INQUIRER) have had to do, reduce the size owing to the exigencies of financial strain.

May I be allowed a word on your more definite criticisms? You will surely not deny that it is a compliment rather than a condemnation that you should select two articles as worthy of the pages of THE INQUIRER. It is encouraging to have these contributions by distinguished authorities on their respective subjects, described as being so catholic in tone that they are equally fitted for either of two such distinct papers as your own and The Church Times. We shall do our best to retain that generous breadth of spirit. After what your reviewer said about his deep distaste for new sectional movements it is a little surprising to find his somewhat languid interest stirred at the prospect of a "coming secession." It is not quite clear whether it is our coming secession to another communion, or a coming secession from other communions to us that whets his anticipation. I do not wish to dash the meanest of his hopes, but I ought to say that I am not aware of any intention on our part to secede, and I trust that THE INQUIRER and the particular sectional movement it seeks to represent will never make it necessary for us to contemplate any such step.

You suggest that we should be more sparing of the use of the language of sacrament and ritual which lapses so easily into formalism. It is quite true that there is a pedestrian and prosaic order of mind that is impervious to the meaning of such language, or, if pervious, liable to get into a panic over it. I thank you, therefore, for the warning, for I can quite see how easily an alarmist cry can be raised. Still, I should have thought that Mr. Whitaker's admirable and conciliatory article would, if people would only read it, entirely defeat the designs of the most expert alarmist. For my own part, I believe that what peril there is to-day is that anti-formalism should lapse into a soulless and sterilising form. There is no tittle of evidence that that vague and convenient generalisation "the Spirit of Life" is more amiably uniting among the Kensitite anti-ritualists than among the High Churchmen whom they attack. Nor do I think that any of our soldiers at the front would say that the sacramentalist priests have shown any deficiency of Christian vitality and consecration and self-sacrifice as compared with the ministers of what the Serjeant calls "the fancy religions." The splendid truth is that chaplains of all churches have covered themselves with glory by their extraordinary heroism and devotion. The suggestion of formalism seems therefore a little indicative of that untimeliness and of that sectional temper which you rightly deplore.

I did my best to explain in the first article what I mean by the word "catholic." I use it as I find it used frequently in your own leading articles. It suggests to me both Catholicism as a historical and continuing fact of Christian development and the Catholic Spirit of Christ from whom that development takes its chief historic source. These two are not in my view mutually exclusive. In the February number, in an article long enough to satisfy your reviewer, I have tried to make this quite plain.

I am glad and truly grateful that you mercifully suspend judgment and ask for more light. I hope very earnestly and indeed confidently that The Free Catholic will be able to give it to you month by month. At the same time I would beg you not to suspend a favourable judgment so long that when it comes we shall be able to dispense with it and say that your sympathy had it been timely had been kind.—Yours, &c.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS,
Editor of The Free Catholic.

131 Pershore Road, Birmingham,
January 17, 1916.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I am sure that my fellow-contributors to the Free Catholic will, like myself, wish to profit from the criticisms offered by your reviewer. If we improve, I hope you will reward us with your encouragement, but if not please chastise us again. There is, however, one particular in which I for one could not accept his well-meant advice. "They should be more sparing in their use of the language of sacrament and ritual, and dwell a little more upon the unifying power of the spirit of life." No, sir; the last clause in the sentence is just an example of the sort of language we must sedulously avoid. It is this kind of dry, colourless talk, which, when it is substituted for the great, passionate speech of Christian symbol and devotion, exactly represents that aridity in our churches which Free Catholics deplore—what a lady, criticising our hymns to me, called "Emerson and water" (which if not dry is certainly thin). If we cannot at present bridge over the schism in thought and doctrine now dividing us from the other churches, we can at least use the same language when we mean the same thing. The objection of your reviewer is of the kind which was made to the building of Hope Street Church, Gee Cross Chapel and Monton, when, in place of the former chapels, Gothic churches with their suggestion of a return to Christian traditions were substituted. Then there is the hint at secession. I can only say that such a thing never enters my thoughts. On the contrary, you will see in our editorial a strong call to other Churchmen to secede to us. We wish for a Catholic Church which shall be so inclusive that secessions will not be necessary. But if that is to be, our own group of churches must shake off their narrowness.—Yours, &c.,

W. WHITAKER.

Jan. 17, 1916.

[We are afraid that our correspondent comes dangerously near to condemning the New Testament as "dry, colourless talk," for it certainly makes more use of the language of the Spirit than it does of that of sacrament and ritual. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." "If any man hath not the spirit of Christ he is none of his." Are sentences like these, which are among the noblest watchwords of Christian universalism, to be described as arid, mere "Emerson and water"?]

UNITARIAN MINISTERS FROM OTHER DENOMINATIONS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—A statement in your notice of the last Essex Hall Year-Book raises an interesting question. Commenting upon the fact that sixty ministers were trained for the ministry in other denominations, it is added: "this feature is of comparatively recent date." Though "comparatively recent" is an elastic term it can hardly be meant to stretch for more than thirty years. The Unitarian Pocket Almanac for 1885 contains a list of 353 ministers, 262 in charge of congregations, 91 without charge, 51 of these are described as from other denominations. The old Almanac was much less definite than the new Year-Book, and it contains many names of doubtful origin of which a considerable proportion would probably belong to other denominations, but even apart from this, the number was not much less thirty years ago than it is to-day.—Yours, &c. CLEMENT E. PIKE.

MINISTERS ON ARMY SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The question of the provision of pulpit supplies for ministers engaged on Army Service was considered by the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at their meeting on Jan. 12, when it was resolved to commend the scheme of the Ministerial Fellowship to the various district Societies and unions, and to express the hope that they will co-operate in carrying it out in all practicable ways. Obviously some congregations will require very little assistance, while others may require a great deal. It does not seem desirable that congregations should be relieved of the whole financial burden. The Committee of the Association are of opinion that the District Societies and Unions are the most suitable bodies for undertaking any administrative duties that the circumstances may call for. In cases where financial aid is required, other than what the congregations and District Societies are able to provide, the Association is willing to render assistance.—Yours, &c.,

W. COPELAND BOWIE,
Secretary.

IT is with sincere pleasure that we welcome our old and tried friend The Athenæum in its new dress. It is true there is some regret for the weekly companion of the bookish man, who first learned from it the dignity of the reviewer's art and the unfailing charm of publishers' advertisements. Its blossoming into a monthly organ of literature, with unflagging youth and spring-time vigour in its veins, during this winter of our discontent is of happy augury. Are we wrong in describing it as promotion? For the editor of a monthly magazine takes his dignified place among the élite of the profession, and we hope thinks with compassion of the daily and weekly journalists whom he has left behind. We are glad to say that The Athenæum in its enlarged form will retain many of its familiar features. It will also contain special signed articles of greater length. Those in the present number are 'Readers and Reviewers,' by Mr. Edmund Gosse, and 'The Question of Sex in Fiction' by R. F. We understand that special attention will be devoted to foreign literature. Unfortunately it is still very hard for the educated Englishman to keep himself in touch with the books of other countries. It is a gap which needs to be filled, and The Athenæum with its fine traditions ought to be able to fill it better than any one else.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

THE REV. GEORGE FOX.

IT is with deep regret that we announce the death of the Rev. George Fox, George Fox of Park Lane as Lancashire men used always to call him in affectionate remembrance of his long and gracious ministry in the mining village near Wigan, which goes by that name. Those who recollect him in his active years will long preserve the memory of his alert and eager figure, his single-minded devotion to his work, and the wide range of his interests; while those who met him for the first time during the years of his retirement felt at once that they were in the presence of a man who knew how to grow old and to keep a young heart. Many years ago, under the editorship of the Rev. T. L. Marshall he was a valued contributor to our columns. Mr. Fox was the son of Robert Fox, Elder of the East India House and his wife, Isaat Owen, and spent his early years in Taunton and London. Always a student, he was in a great measure self-educated when he entered the Unitarian Home Missionary Board, as it was then styled in 1855, under the staff of Dr. Beard, the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., and the Rev. Brooke Herford. Here he was a distinguished student, winning the prize offered by the late Mr. H. A. Bright, of Liverpool. His first settlement was at Mossley, where he took charge of the Christian Church. Here he spent nearly six years, doing much hard work and winning the undying affection of the people. So strong was this that seventeen years after he had left Mossley (in 1864), they invited him once more to be their minister. In addition to his ordinary work he organised a local relief fund during the cotton famine, on the committee of which he was the only minister to sit. Much of the funds he obtained from wealthy and generous Unitarians. He taught twice in the Sunday school every Sunday, a practice which he maintained till the end of his ministry. Finding the work growing too heavy for him he accepted the invitation to the old Presbyterian Chapel of Park Lane, near Wigan. While at Mossley he was married to Mary, the daughter of Peter Eyes of Croft, by whom he had two sons, Sir Robert E. Fox, Town Clerk of Leeds, and the Rev. Arthur W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden. She died in 1867, and in 1868 he married Beatrice Jane, daughter of Hugh Gaskell, formerly of Ince Hall. She died in December, 1882. Mr. Fox entered upon his twenty-six years' ministry at Park Lane in 1864. Amongst other things he established an undenominational day school, of which he was for years the secretary. He was one of the founders of the now flourishing Co-operative Society, of which he was hon. treasurer for seventeen years, and he set on foot a village club and a bowling green. He established the annual Old Folks' Tea Party and the Band of Hope Demonstration. He was also an active member of the committee of the Ashton-in-Makerfield Charities. When he had completed his twenty-five years' service he was presented with a service of silver plate. He had a flourishing Band of Hope in connection with which he taught a large singing class for many years. His keen musical sense and his beautiful tenor voice much assisted him in this congenial work. He was a strong and convinced Unitarian, and did his share in preparing the ground for more than one Unitarian Chapel. He had preached before the Provincial Assembly, he had joined in establishing the East Cheshire Christian Union, he had been one of the founders of the Missionary Conference and of the Ministers' Monthly Conference. When he retired to Cheadle Hulme he took with him the warm regard of a host of friends of all denominations. Eight of his young men are now mine managers, and to be one of "Mr. Fox's young men" was usually a sufficient testimonial on seeking for employment. He spent his last years in quiet and useful service, rendered freely and with untiring industry.

The funeral took place on Monday, January 10th. A memorial service was held at the Congregational Church, Cheadle Hulme, which was attended by a large number of his friends in the ministry, including the vicar of the parish and deputations from Mossley and Park Lane. The committal service at the Crematorium was conducted by the Rev. H. Fisher Short, and the ashes were subsequently interred in the family grave in the Chapel Burial Ground at Park Lane.

MRS. ROWLAND HILL OF BEDFORD.

AFTER nearly forty-five years of happy married life Mrs. Rowland Hill, of Bedford, "passed on" early on the night of January 10 after a long illness, and also after a life of great usefulness. Not only did she play the harmonium at the services she originated in 1872, and for some years afterwards, but throughout the long interval she has been a living epistle indeed of our joyous and simple faith. She was a Guardian of the Poor for fifteen years, who really guarded the poor, and was once styled "Mother of the Poor"; while her devotion to the temperance movement, especially to its Band of Hope aspect, was known far and wide. During the last eighteen months she did all she could for the recreation and comfort of the troops stationed in the town, and when, at last, she had to keep her bed she still cared for them. She was treasurer of the Women's Liberal Association, and for ten years' President of the Women's Guild. At the funeral on January 13 many friends attended to show their respect to her memory, and their sympathy with her husband and daughters. The service was conducted with much feeling, by the Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh, and the bright sunshine which lasted during the simple ceremony was in full harmony with the sweetness and beauty of character which were among the most marked features of the life of our friend. She had entered her 70th year last September.

MRS. HINCKS.

THE announcement in our last issue of the death of Mrs. Elizabeth Hincks, widow of the late Rev. Thomas Hincks, F.R.S., will have been noticed by many with deep regret. Almost exactly seventeen years ago her venerable husband passed to his rest in his 81st year; and now she has followed at the ripe age of upwards of 92, outliving her two daughters, the last of the family so respected and loved at Stoke Leigh. She was Miss Allen of Warrington, and married Mr. Hincks when he was minister of Cairo Street Chapel, in 1846. They removed the same year to Exeter, and in 1852 to Sheffield, before settling in 1855 at Leeds, where he ministered with great acceptance and excercised a rare spiritual influence until his enforced retirement, by loss of voice, from the pulpit of Mill Hill Chapel in 1869.

They made their home in Bristol, in a lovely spot among the woods overlooking the Avon Gorge. Mr. Hincks devoted himself to scientific studies, was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and published a learned work in 1889 on 'British Marine Polyzoa,' while he maintained his deep interest in religion and in the principles of the denomination in which he had been brought up. A more united household it would be difficult to find or a more cultivated one. Books, drawings, flowers, trees, birds, are the environment which every one will remember who has been privileged to visit that beautiful household. Mrs. Hincks appreciated to the full her husband's scientific and artistic tastes and powers, and was herself a woman of fine gifts. She never sank her personality in what is called "the minister's wife," and therefore the more helped to keep his thought and energies fresh. Friends will recall her keenness, her charming conversation, her wit and incisiveness, always her delightfulness. The "labour and sorrow" the Psalmist speaks of were indeed present in her last years, but there was so much more, so much that makes life worth living and sacred and full of promise and expectation. Her mind was clear to the last, alert, interested, strong with a great faith.

Her funeral took place at Lawnsdown, Leeds, on Wednesday, the 12th inst., the Rev. Edgar I. Fripp officiating. After cremation her ashes were laid with those of her beloved children beside the body of her husband. One grave holds what was mortal of them, and in Heaven they are "gathered again."

A CRIPPLED BELGIAN BOY.

THE following case has been brought to my notice by Dr. and Mme. Lageot of Calais. I have known both for nearly a year and have often spoken of their devoted work for their country people, and I am sure that if they recommend a case for help it is with fullest knowledge, and that there is reason to hope that, with the care asked for, the child may become a healthy man. At the present rate of exchange the 75 francs will amount to about £2 15*s.* a month. I shall be very glad to transmit the money and arrange all details if some one will undertake to contribute this amount.

CASE OF ROBERT BEHEYT OF OSTEND AGED 12 YEARS.

The family consists of father, mother, girl of 17 years and boy of 12. They fled from Ostend in a small fishing boat, on which they and another family lived. The quarters were very cramped and there was not a bed on board. Since their arrival in Calais they have been ekeing out a precarious existence by the father's fishing. The boy, who limped badly, came to the École Albert Elizabeth, and as after a time he began to suffer severe pain in his side, Dr. Lageot examined him under the X-rays and discovered that his hip was fractured. He is at present in the Hospital Elizabeth at Calais, but, as it is a military hospital, he must not stay there indefinitely. Moreover, if he is to be saved from being a cripple all his life he must have very special care. This can be given him at the Institut de Berck-sur-Mer, under Dr. Calot, but the treatment will cost 75 francs a month and several months may be necessary. As the family was in dire poverty the mother and daughter went to Paris to try and find work; but after three days' search, their resources came to an end, and they were sent off to Brittany by the authorities. The invalid child has therefore now only his father left at Calais. The boy's leg is at present in plaster of Paris, and it is impossible for him to be removed to the fishing boat, as he could not be lifted down into the cabin, and even if he could be got there he could not have the special care or treatment which he requires. Help, therefore, is urgently needed to enable him to be sent away to the special institution at Berck.

ROSE ALLEN.

THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT MOVEMENT.

THE first General Meeting of the Fight for Right Movement was held on Wednesday afternoon, January 12, at 22, Albemarle Street, Sir Frederick Pollock in the chair. Among those present were Lord Bryce, Sir Francis Younghusband, Mr. W. W. Asquith, Mr. John Buchan, Mr. Robert Bridges, Lady Smith-Dorrien, Lady Acland Hood and the Rev. Hudson Shaw. The Secretary, Mr. Robinson Smith, gave a short account of the work done since the inception of the Movement, and reported that the membership at the present time was 350. The Chairman cordially welcomed Lord Bryce, who was unanimously elected President, and the Draft Rules prepared by the Provisional Committee were submitted to the meeting and discussed.

Lord Bryce, who explained that he could not give the assistance he would like owing to other engagements, but would be pleased to help in any possible way, expressed his belief that in the present struggle we were fighting not merely for humanity, but for moral right. This fact ought to strengthen our hearts and nerve our arms, and if only the idea could be made to prevail in the hearts of the working masses as well as the educated classes, the movement would receive a permanent and enduring response.

The Treasurer, Mr. Paget Bowman, presented the financial statement, and Prof. Caroline Spurgeon, a member of the Executive Committee, urged the members to work enthusiastically by contributing to the funds, distributing literature, and obtaining new members and speakers. The Secretary and Treasurer were duly elected, and the members of the Provisional Committee—Sir Frederick Pollock, Mr. Gervase Elwes, Mr. Philip Kerr, Mrs. Stuart Moore (Evelyn Underhill), Sir Francis Younghusband, K.C.I.E., Mr. Paget J. M. Bowman (Hon. Treasurer) and Mr. A. Robinson Smith (Hon. Secretary)—were elected as Executive Committee of the society. The list of Vice-Presidents, which includes Mr. Robert Bridges, Prof. A. V. Dicey, K.C., Sir Edward Elgar, O.M., Dr. Jane Harrison, Dr. L. P. Jacks, Maurice Hewlett and Dr. Gilbert Murray, is not yet complete.

Miss Stout proposed a vote of thanks to the founder, Sir Francis Younghusband, for his efforts in inaugurating the Movement, which they hoped would be a lasting success with him at the head.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare.—The Rev. E. R. Dennis has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister of the Old Meeting House, Aberdare.

Colne.—From the Treasurer's statement of the recent Bazaar on behalf of the Unitarian Church encouraging and satisfactory results are reported. The Bazaar realised £222 14*s.* 10*d.*, contributions of church members brought £53 10*s.* 6*d.*, donations from other friends and congregations (including £20 British and Foreign Unitarian Association grant) amounted to £82 3*s.* 10*d.*, and with £1 4*s.* 4*d.* bank interest the total income from all sources reached £359 13*s.* 6*d.* After paying expenses a balance of £297 0*s.* 5½*d.* was handed to the Church Treasurer. The Bazaar Executive Committee, when acknowledging the help rendered by the workers, specially thanked the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, the President, and the Secretary, to whom the success of the Bazaar was largely due.

Glasgow.—A meeting to give a welcome to the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones to St. Vincent Street Unitarian Church was held on the 14th inst. in the Central Halls. Mr. Wm. Twaddle presided over a large gathering, and, welcoming the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones and Mrs. Jones to Glasgow, said they were, indeed, fortunate in securing a minister who had such a splendid record of public work in addition to his ministerial experience. He felt confident that under Mr. Jones's leadership they would go forward from strength to strength. Dr. J. K. Wood, Dundee, President of the Scottish Unitarian Association, extended a hearty welcome on behalf of the Scottish churches. Mr. Jones, in reply, stated that he recognised there were difficulties all around us, and we had no creed or dogma to throw at people. It was much harder to be a Christian than to be a theologian. We ought to be proud of the position that we occupy as Unitarians. Men and women were asking very serious questions at this time; they were asking if there was a God, and for some proofs of His existence. He pitied men who had brought themselves to this state. He felt that we had a positive message with our grand Unitarian doctrine, and that he could say with Browning: "Even if the whole Earth is quivering, God is in the Universe, all will be well." The Rev. M. B. Skelland, Ross Street Church, said that the note Mr. Jones had struck was the note with the cutting edge on it. It was the note that Scotland needed. Mr. Jones commenced his ministry on Sunday last, and preached before large congregations both morning and evening.

Hale.—The Rev. W. G. Price, Minister of Hale Chapel, who has enlisted in the R.A.M.C., has written as follows to the members of his congregation in a letter which appears in the January Calendar :—

"MY FRIENDS AND FELLOW-WORSHIPPERS,—The circumstances under which we begin the New Year in our relation as Congregation and Minister are of such an unusual character as to call for a few words from me by way of explanation and appeal. Most of you will know by this time that I am about to take up hospital work with the R.A.M.C., an undertaking which I shall share with many other ministers, including a number of our own. The considerations which have led me to this may be very briefly and simply stated. You already know my views of the war. I am profoundly convinced that a great moral crisis is pending, that the things at stake which we and our Allies are striving to safeguard, are vital to the world's higher welfare, and that the situation demands every effort we can possibly make. In face of such a crisis I feel that the 'Church' should be adequately represented in the ranks of those directly engaged in war service. I yield to no one in the value I set on the Minister's work, and I believe that a great and necessary service is now being done to the State in its trial hour by the Churches. But some Ministers can be spared and those should be the first to go who feel drawn to go. That is my own case. I am simply anxious to identify myself as far as I can with the vast multitude of gallant lads who have answered duty's call without feeling that they are making any sacrifice, and I am taking up the only work which is open to one of my age. It greatly appeals to me. It appeals to me, not indeed in itself—for who can be attracted by the ravages of war on the poor bodies of one's fellowmen?—but it appeals to me as an urgent need and as a task which a Minister can engage in without surrendering any real title he may have to remain in a sacred calling. It appeals to me as a great opportunity to ministers and the Church as a whole to get into touch with life's realities, grim as they are, to see the dread outcome of war at first hand, to mix with one's fellowmen on equal terms, to break down to some extent the barriers of aloofness and strangeness existing between ministers and laity, to bring the Church into more living touch with the world. If ministers and laity can engage in a good work together as man with man, it can augur nothing but good for the Church in the future." Mr. Price concludes his letter with an expression of earnest thanks to the Committee for the sympathy which they have shown and the generous way in which they have acted so as to make the way easy for him.

Killinchy.—A Special Service of Intercession was held on Sunday, January 16, when prayers were said for the soldiers and sailors who are fighting their country's battles on the various fronts. At a critical time in the fortunes of the country we are glad to record the presence of a large congregation, almost exclusively composed of our own members. A special collection was made on behalf of the British Red Cross Society and the Order of St. John to be applied to the sick and wounded of the King's forces. The sum of £11 was realised. The choir sang as an anthem John Oxenham's hymn, 'Lord God of Hosts Whose Mighty hand.' The Rev. D. J. Williams conducted the service and preached an appropriate sermon on the subject for the day.

Leeds, Mill Hill Chapel.—During his sermon at morning service on Sunday, January 16, the Rev. Joseph Wain paid a graceful and appropriate tribute to the late Mrs. Hincks, from which we extract the following sentences: Both Mr. and Mrs. Hincks were much loved and esteemed. It fell to his (the preacher's) lot to know and become well-acquainted with both of them during his missionary work in Bristol, when, with a kind invitation, they often called him to their beautiful home in Clifton. Mrs. Hincks, as they knew, survived her husband and both her daughters; but she bore her lot very bravely and cheerfully. The sorrow to her was though, not in departing, but rather in being left behind. She had been a sweet and gracious presence to two full generations. She was 92 years of age, but the spiritual and mental vigour of her younger days still supported her. At the close of the service 'O Rest in the Lord' was played by the chapel organist (Mr. A. F. Briggs).

Newark.—The work in connection with the Free Christian Church, under the Rev. J. Walter Cock, has been carried on with considerable success since the re-opening of the church three months ago, and the New Year's Party, which was held on January 10, was attended by about a hundred people. A special series of sermons on 'The Coming of the New Civilisation' was started on December 19, and will conclude in February.

Stockport.—The Annual Exchange of Pulpits in the Free Churches of Stockport took place on Sunday last (16th inst.), when for the first time the Unitarian minister was officially included in the exchange. The Rev. Grey Willams of the Congregational Church, Little Moor, preached at St. Petersgate, and our own minister at Wycliffe Congregational Church. A United Communion Service was held on the same evening at the Baptist Church, Greek Street, to which our congregation was invited. A number of members accepted the invitation and attended the service. The Rev. H. E. Perry has been elected a member of the Free Church Ministers' Association, and is now on the rota for the Workhouse services and Infirmary visitation. He also takes his turn in conducting the Nonconformist services at the military hospitals.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A CHILDREN'S PLAY.

A very pleasant entertainment was given at the Margaret Morris Theatre, Chelsea, on Saturday and Monday evening, Jan. 15 and 17, in aid of the Red Cross Society, under the special patronage of Col. John Ward, J.P., M.P., when an original children's play by Miss Nora Lickis (Mrs. Neden) entitled 'The Wonder Mother,' was produced. Miss Lickis has more than once contributed to the pages of the INQUIRER, and we are glad to offer her our congratulations on an excellent piece of work, and on her own impersonation of the "gracious lady" who weaves such innocent magic by means of the lovable little dreamers who form her train in the Palace of the Stars. No one not already in the secret would have known that the writer of the play and the Wonder Mother were one and the same person, for the fact was not announced on the programme, but a call for "author" before the curtain fell revealed the truth. We hope Miss Lickis's production will be available for performance elsewhere, for it is full of happy ideas, simply expressed, with which we would wish that all children might be familiar, and is not without a wholesome touch of humour as well—which is quite as it should be. The amalgamation of the fairy kingdom with that of the Wonder Mother, whose realm is the realm of thoughts and dreams, was a happy idea. We should have resented it very much if there had been any conquest of the one by the other, as this would have been untrue to fact, and very upsetting to old-fashioned notions. The performance was charmingly carried out by a bevy of children whose singing and dancing were much enjoyed.

BRITISH EARTHQUAKES.

According to Prof. W. Boyd Dawkins, earthquake tremors such as have been experienced recently are continually happening, but many of them are so slight that they can only be detected by the seismograph. They are traced to certain centres by accurately ascertaining the time at which the vibration is felt at different places. The tremor spreads in circles in much the same way as the ripples caused by a stone flung or dropped into water. All the earthquakes in this country that have been mapped out have been traced to slipping of the rocks along lines of "faulting" or smashing. The shocks felt in Manchester, for instance, are attributed to what is known as the Pendleton Fault, a great line of smash along which the rocks have become dislocated and have fallen a depth of about a thousand yards. It may be mentioned, by the way, that Dr. Charles Davison, of Birmingham, who has been carrying on investigations of British earthquakes for twenty-seven years, asks for information from any place where the disturbance was felt on Jan. 14.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

A PIECE of good luck has come to us this week, for we have been asked to do another piece of work for our friends the Belgian soldiers on a fairly large scale. In a town in the war zone, which is well known to us, 2,000 of them are quartered, in addition to the numerous patients in the hospitals. There is great need of a place of rest and recreation for them, similar to the Y.M.C.A. huts which have been such a boon to our own men. A suitable site has been found, plans have been drawn, and now those who have this scheme at heart have turned to us to see whether we can supply the necessary funds. This we have promised to do, for we are convinced of the urgency of the need, and it will be carrying on the ministry of cheerfulness, good fellowship, and wholesome recreation which we have found to be so valuable in the convalescent depots.

THE large wooden hut will contain a hall capable of seating 500 men, with a stage for concerts and dramatic performances, a lecture room for 60 men where educational classes can be held, a reading room to accommodate 40, and a small chapel. It will be under the personal direction of M. Van Segvelt, a venerable curé from the Malines district, a man of noble spirit who is well known to us for his devoted work among both civilians and soldiers since the beginning of the war. All the work of the establishment will be done by Belgians, and will be no expense to us. A pleasant feature of the scheme is that a hearty welcome will also be given to any English or French soldiers in the town who may care to use the club. M. Van Segvelt has begun the work already in two small rooms, and is crowded out.

THE club house then will be the gift of our Fund. After the war it will still have its use, for we have arranged with M. Van Segvelt that he may remove it to his own village in Belgium, where it will serve as a temporary church and parish-room until new buildings can be erected in place of those which have been destroyed by the Germans. The cost to us will be between £400 and £500. We know that many hearts will at once warm to the scheme. Some months ago we made an appeal with good success to our motoring friends. We put the case now to those who value the comfort and good fellowship of a club. It is a fine opportunity of doing a good turn to the men of the Belgian army who are cut off entirely from their homes, and have very few pleasant things to call their own.

BEFORE we pass on to other topics we record with pleasure the announcement, which appeared in The Westminster Gazette on Monday, that the machine-gun corps which was sent by the Belgian Government to Russia three months ago has been reviewed by the Czar on the eve of their departure for an unknown destination. We have been aware of this help offered by Belgium to Russia for a considerable time, and also of many other things which are greatly to the credit of the courage and endurance of her army; but it has not seemed wise to mention them. We are glad that a corner of the veil has been lifted, for it is only right that people in this country should know something of the splendid efforts which Belgium has made to refit her army and keep it as a fighting force in the field. Those of us who know a good deal more than it is prudent for military reasons to put on record have the strongest possible admiration for what has been achieved. Some day the brave story will be written for all men to read it.

THE MILITARY SERVICE BILL has passed its third reading in the House of Commons with only thirty dissentients. It is thus an expression of the will of Parliament, and Parliament, in spite of what some cavillers may say, still represents the will of the nation. In these circumstances the only policy for men who are not prepared to risk anarchy and disaster while the country is at war, is one of cheerful obedience. It is announced that the small group of dissentient Liberals intend to keep together and to hold a watching brief for liberty. With all respect, we would express the hope that they will not degenerate into a party with a grievance. Let them at least acknowledge handsomely that other people care just as much for freedom as they do. There is always a danger that a temporary political association of this kind may harden into a settled temper of suspicion and protest, and exalt disagreement into a virtue. It is its misfortune that it is almost bound to fall asunder unless there are frequent occasions for criticism and complaint. At a time when the interests that unite us reduce our disagreements to very modest proportions, it may well be doubted whether the position of the detached and watchful critic is one which any body of men can occupy with real advantage to the nation.

THE newspaper agitation which has sought to embarrass the Government on the question of the naval blockade has been entirely discredited by the publication of a mass of official figures dealing with neutral trade. It is no answer to say that it is the fault of the Government if suspicion grows in the public mind in the absence of full information. The suspicion is entirely the creation of a press campaign which may be carried to such lengths as to force the Government to disclose facts in self-defence, though it may be hardly prudent to do so. Intelligent criticism is always useful, and responsible ministers are the first to welcome it; but it must not be pushed to the length of getting up a case or of manipulating figures so as to make everything appear as bad as possible. The public interest would not suffer if newspapers were to cultivate a little more modesty and reticence, and were even to admit sometimes that they may possibly be ill-informed. Few people really believe that it is only the infallible knowledge and wisdom of the Press which saves the country from the crimes and follies of a stupid Government.

AND all the time we have men at the head of affairs who are facing all the intricate difficulties of our relationships with neutral countries with unfailing wisdom and resource. We do not want to act the part of the forceful bully in this war. To do so would not be to secure a short-cut to success, but to multiply all our difficulties by throwing the neutral countries into the arms of Germany. This was the note of grave warning in Sir Edward Grey's speech in the House of Commons on Wednesday. We have to act in accordance with the rights of neutrals. We must not, as Sir Edward Grey put it, try to make the grass grow in the streets of neutral ports. "If we had gone as far as that," he said, "the war might possibly have been over by now, but it would have been over because the whole world would have been against us, and we and our Allies would have collapsed under the general resentment of the whole world."

WE are very sorry that it has been decided to close many of the public galleries and museums in London owing to the war. Some of the most valuable exhibits may have been withdrawn for purposes of safety, and it is stated than an economy of £50,000 per annum will be effected. All the same the action seems to us to be unfortunate and hardly to fall under the category of necessary war measures to which we must all cheerfully submit. London is too vast to go on indefinitely without adequate means of recreation. The public house is still open, it is true under severe restrictions; the picture palace and the music hall draw crowded audiences to their entertainments; but most of the national collections are to be closed. From the point of view of the large number of soldiers who pass through London and often stay there with a good deal of time on their hands, it seems a mistake to shut them out from any alternative to the lighter and more bizarre forms of amusement. We do not wish, however, to speak too strongly on the matter, for it may have more wisdom in it than appears on the surface, and we know how easy it is to find objections to almost every form of public economy which is suggested.

A VIGOROUS and combative letter from Mr. Frederic Harrison on the subject of 'Principle' appeared in The Times on Monday. It is a word which is often on our lips, and many of us have gone into battle or suffered from the disabilities which fall to the lot of small minorities, for the sake of it. But it is well that we should be challenged to examine afresh what we mean by it, in the searching light which is cast upon it by present events. Just as our doctrine of freedom is no final and infallible dogma, so the word "principle" is often made to cover many shifting opinions and preferences. "Adhesion to principle," as Mr. Harrison reminds us, "like every other duty in human life is relative, not absolute; and over-mastering change of circumstances may convert it into a folly and a crime."

> I have been through life [he continues] a Republican, a Nationalist, a Free Trader, a Labour champion, an anti-suffragette, a constitutional and international lawyer, a believer in popular government. So I am still. But when the life of our country requires the provisional suspension of any one of these principles—or of all of them together—I should write myself down an ass and a traitor if I hesitated to hold them in abeyance.

These are strong and pungent words, but their challenge will do us good if they force us to face the danger to which some of us may be exposed, of sacrificing the whole to a part, and mistaking our own opinions for the laws of the universe. Some "principles" are only very strong personal preferences.

WEDNESDAY was the 200th anniversary of the death of Dr. Daniel Williams, the founder of the library and the benevolent trusts which are called by his name. In their breadth and charity, and the spirit of toleration in which they have been administered, these trusts reflect the excellent qualities of his own character.

> "He was remarkable," says his biographer, "for his boldness and courage in avowing and defending what he conceived to be truth of importance, and 'pursued what he thought right with a blunt integrity and unshaken resolution.' At the same time his candour towards those who differed from him, his kind treatment of persons who had endeavoured to injure his own reputation, and his conscientious tender regard for that of others, were prominent features in his character. He was a steady nonconformist upon principle; yet he maintained a charitable disposition towards the Established Church, and at the Revolution was very desirous of promoting the scheme of comprehension. Though he possessed an ample fortune, he exercised great frugality in his personal expenses, for the noble purpose of being more useful to others who stood in need of assistance, and of more effectually serving the great interests of truth and virtue."

It is this ample fortune which for nearly two centuries has cheered the lot of the poor scholar, and helped young men through their student days, and made the widow's heart to sing for joy.

IT was hoped that it might be possible to arrange for a proper celebration of the bicentenary, which would call public attention to the work of the Trust, and emphasise the great services of the Library to the cause of learning especially in the departments of theology and historical research. Owing to the war, this was found to be impossible, but the event was not allowed to pass without notice at the quarterly meeting of the trustees this week. Following the example of a hundred years ago, they paid an official visit to the founder's tomb in Bunhill Fields, where a simple and touching address was made by Dr. P. H. Wicksteed, the senior member of the Trust. We may add that we have made arrangements for a special series of commemorative articles dealing with the work of the Trust and the Library, which will appear shortly in our columns,

ARE WE GETTING TIRED?

WHEN we ask the question, are we getting tired? we do not refer to tired bodies. They do not greatly matter, if that is the price we have to pay for unlimited faithfulness to hard and unusual duties. We are thinking of tired minds and spirits that have grown weary. We began our national task eighteen months ago in a mood of high resolve, which cleansed us from many evil things. Our commonplace lives were flooded with moral idealism. We found it easy to give free play to our sympathies, to be thoughtful for others, to treat our own cares lightly, to suppress the unkind thoughts and the harsh judgments of ordinary days. We really lived in a larger world and breathed its air, and in the strength and joy of it the spirit of criticism and grumbling no longer had dominion over us. Have this largeness of mind and this cheerfulness of temper persisted? Do they still guard our hearts from evil, and banish the gloom and despondency which cripple our own energies and create an atmosphere of discouragement for other men? These are questions which the religious man is bound to ask, as he looks into his own heart or watches the eddies and cross-currents of feeling in the life of the nation.

To be quite candid we are all conscious of a certain amount of strain, and it is strain which comes quite as much from the monotony of the war as from its excitements. It is proving to be a much longer business than many of us hoped. It is still necessary that we should concentrate all the energy and passion of our lives upon it in order to bring it to a successful issue; but the absence of critical danger for ourselves, and the high level of prosperity which has been maintained in all classes of society, have made it possible for many of us to grow listless and critical. The fact that things have gone on so much as usual has in it an element of serious moral danger. If we really heard the war thundering at our own gates we could not possibly say that we were tired of it.

This spirit shows itself in some quarters in a tendency to morbid gloom. To some people the war has become an obsession, almost a nightmare. They do not doubt the rightness of our part in it. They are not guilty of the sin of moral indecision. But everything has become a little blunted and dulled, and the first rapture of confident faith has given place to worry and depression. They live for the most part in a mood of physical revolt against the casualty lists, and anxiety about their friends and pathetic longing for something decisive to happen. Perhaps it must be confessed that they think too much about the war because they are too tired of its burden to think of it in the right way.

There are others who tell us that they have heard quite enough about the war and they want to forget it as much as they can. The other interests which absorbed them two years ago in business or politics or social activities or religious work have returned, and pushed the absorbing topic of the hour almost into a position of secondary importance. While other men are fighting for all the high interests of humanity which are placed in jeopardy, it is more natural to them to live in the familiar compartments and to give their chief attention to the old tasks. The strain of keeping thought and imagination on the stretch has been too much for them. When victory is in sight they will become eager once more, but in the long dull days they leave it to other men to combat the dangers of spiritual fatigue and to guard strength of purpose and clearness of vision in face of all disappointments and delays.

It must suffice to refer in a word to the waning power of cohesion which is often the penalty of slow progress. It is a sign of intense vitality when the life of a whole people is drawn up into the unity of a common purpose. When this unity is attacked by the spirit of criticism and complaint, and small groups allow themselves to drift into antagonism to the common mind, though danger threatens and the battle is still in progress, we are often right to look for the cause not in a noble independence of character, but in the commonplace failures of will which may follow a period of keen emotional tension. When we are tired we find it hard to agree, and grow very obstinate for our own opinions.

We mention these things not because we want to dwell upon them or to exaggerate their importance, but for a practical purpose. If the enemy is lurking within we must be on our guard. Under present circumstances we can find no cure for tired hearts in forgetfulness. We must accept the facts just as they are, and renew our vows of service and dedication day by day and week by week. It involves facing terror without flinching, and bearing disappointment without desponding, and allowing no private preference or opinion of our own to interfere with complete surrender to the common cause. For all sectional interests must be merged in the larger life of the nation, and the whole life of the nation must be taken up into the presence of God. It is only in this way that we can find security and a constant renewal of our strength. We began this effort in a mood of religious exaltation, feeling that God required of us to dare all and to risk all for what we knew to be right. Who are we that we should complain of the length of our task or grow tired under its strain? We must see to it that we keep through all the length of days the cheerfulness and courage, the quiet trust and steadfast faith, which will make the final victory, when it comes, as religious as the initial vow.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

The sun descending in the West,
The evening star doth shine;
The birds are silent in their nest,
And I must seek for mine.
The moon, like a flower
In heaven's high bower,
With silent delight
Sits and smiles on the night.

Farewell, green fields and happy groves,
Where flocks have took delight.
Where Lambs have nibbled, silent moves
The feet of angels bright;
Unseen they pour blessing,
And joy without ceasing,
On each bud and blossom,
And each sleeping bosom....

And there the lion's ruddy eyes
Shall flow with tears of gold,
And pitying the tender cries,
And walking round the fold,

Saying: Wrath by His meekness,
And, by His health, sickness,
Is driven away
From our immortal day....
WILLIAM BLAKE.

BUT notwithstanding these helps, I found myself a man encompassed with infirmities; the parting with my wife and poor children hath often been to me in this place as the pulling of the flesh from the bones, and that not only because I am somewhat too fond of these great mercies, but also because I should have often brought to my mind the many hardships, miseries, and wants that my poor family was like to meet with should I be taken from them, especially my poor blind child, who lay nearer my heart than all beside. Oh! the thoughts of the hardship I thought my poor blind one might go under, would break my heart to pieces. Poor child! thought I, what sorrow art thou like to have for thy portion in this world! Thou must be beaten, must beg, suffer hunger, cold, nakedness, and a thousand calamities, though I cannot now endure the wind should blow upon thee. But yet recalling myself, thought I, I must venture you all with God, though it goeth to the quick to leave you. Oh! I saw in this condition I was as a man who was pulling down his house upon the head of his wife and children; yet, thought I, I must do it, I must do it....I had also this consideration, that if I should venture all for God, I engaged God to take care of my concernments: but if I forsook him in his ways, for fear of any trouble that should come to me or mine, then I should not only falsify my profession, but should count also that my concernments were not so sure if left at God's feet, while I stood to and for his name, as they would be if under my own care, though with the denial of the way of God.—From 'Grace Abounding,' by John Bunyan.

WE beseech Thee, our most gracious God, preserve us from the cares of this life, lest we should be too much entangled therein; also from the many necessities of the body, lest we should be ensnared by pleasure; and from whatsoever is an obstacle to the soul, lest, being broken with troubles, we should be overthrown. Give us strength to resist, patience to endure, and constancy to persevere. Amen.

THE CHURCH AND WAR, IN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES.

II.

WE are now come to the decisive critical epoch in the history of the Church when her relation to the State went through a fundamental change. The persecution under Diocletian, during which the whole political power of the Empire was arrayed against the Church, had failed; and the so-called conversion of Constantine in 312, and the edict of toleration in the following year, mark an epoch also in the development of Christian thought on war, as on many other things. The wars of Constantine against pagan tyrants like Maxentius and Licinius were "holy wars." The power of the State was being exerted on the side of the Almighty against the heathen. This appears plainly in the panegyrics of Eusebius, the most learned and in many ways the most representative Churchman of the age.

From this time, Christians acquiesced in the current Roman view of the legitimacy of war. The old view was occasionally asserted; but it could not maintain itself, for it rested on the assumption of an absolute cleavage between the whole body of believing Christians and the State. And the gulf between the two had disappeared. Prof. M'Giffert has referred to some significant utterances of Ambrose in this connection—the same Ambrose who, when the Emperor Theodosius, red-handed from a brutal massacre, approached the entry of the Cathedral Church of Milan, stopped him there and forbade his approach to the altar of Christ. In his work 'On the Duties of the Clergy' Ambrose speaks of the warrior heroes of the Old Testament as "our fathers," and refers to the glory which they won in war. He affirms that the courage which defends our country against a hostile force is a righteous courage; and, in a more general reference, that he who does not ward off injury from a friend, if he be able, is as much at fault as he who causes it.

It is, however, Augustine whose teaching on the subject has had a determining influence on Christian thought for fifteen centuries. He is well aware of the complexities of the problem. He refers to John's treatment of the Roman soldiers, to Christ's treatment of the believing centurion, and to Christ's recognition of the State in the maxim "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." With reference to the passive precepts contained in part of Matthew's version of the Sermon on the Mount, summed up in the "non-resistance doctrine," he urges that indiscriminate yielding to the mere wish and will of others is not reasonable, right, or Christian; and that Christ spoke of the inner disposition not the act of outward yielding or submission. A man must always be inwardly ready to take the attitude of non-resistance, if there be occasion for it. But sometimes he must take another course, for the sake of the common good, or even for the sake of those with whom he is contending.

Augustine's verdict as to the right of war is summarily stated in the following sentences from his principal work against the Manichæans: "It depends on the reasons for which men undertake war and the authority by which they do it. The natural order fitted to promote the peace of man demands that the prince [i.e., the State] should have authority to wage war and the right to decide in the matter, and that the soldiers should serve the common peace and safety by performing their military duties" (Reply to Faustus, xxii. 75). Augustine's verdict became decisive for later thinkers. Even so powerful a mind as that of Thomas Aquinas does little more than repeat his statements: "There are three requisites for a war to be just. The first is the authority of the prince [the State] by whose command the war is to be waged. A private person has no right to start a war....The second is a just cause, so that they who are attacked should deserve to be attacked for some injury that they have done. Hence Augustine says that just wars are those which punish injuries, in cases where a State has to be chastised for having either neglected to punish the evil doings of its people or neglected to restore what has been wrongfully taken away. The third is a right intention of promoting good or avoiding evil. For, as Augustine says again, eagerness to hurt, the passion for revenge, an untamed and unforgiving temper, ferocity in renewing the struggle, lust of dominion [dominandi, arbitrary rule]—these and the like excesses are justly blamed in war."

It would be interesting, if time and space allowed, to follow the story of the Church in her dealings with war during the Middle Ages. Resolute endeavours were made to mitigate the evils of the private wars which were carried on locally by territorial magnates, impelled usually by ambition, ferocity, or greed. In addition to her frequent attempts to mediate between combatants, the Church declared it a flagrant offence against God to attack monks, priests, pilgrims, peasants, women, and other non-combatants and defenceless persons, or to profane churches and other sacred places by conflict and bloodshed. She also sought to establish the custom of limiting warfare to certain days of the week, and to give the custom a religious sanction under the name of "The Truce of God." But against all this must be set the multitudinous miseries inflicted on mankind by the "religious wars" which the Church expressly sanctioned and encouraged, more especially in post-Reformation times. Her original attempts to put an end to private wars did not succeed. In order to succeed she must have identified herself with the secular State; and in the age when such practices flourished, it cannot be said that a secular State existed. With the consolidation of monarchical power, from the thirteenth century onwards, private warfare ceased.

The Roman Catholic doctrine as to the right of war is based on that of Aquinas, who, as we have seen, reproduces in principle the position of Augustine. It is much more clearly, thoroughly, and carefully thought out, and therefore more consistent and intelligible, than any treatment of the subject, which I have seen, professing to represent the position of Protestant Christianity. An examination of the article on 'War' in the 'Catholic Encyclopædia' will bear out and illustrate the first part of this statement. One element of strength, in the Catholic doctrine of the ethics of war, lies in the view that there is a natural law or natural morality, which has its rightful place and is indeed divinely sanctioned: and that the "revealed" Christian law has expanded and deepened, but not displaced, this natural law, which controls and must control the relations of man with man and nation with nation. A conscience, claiming to be Christian and on that ground claiming the right simply to reject the verdict of the natural conscience, falls into fundamental moral error. The natural law is written on the heart of man from the beginning; but it is not the mere instinctive verdict of individual feeling; it requires interpretation. The decalogue is one such interpretation. The moral as distinct from the ceremonial element, throughout the Jewish law, emanates from the same source. This means, in effect, that the Christian revelation must be interpreted in the light of the pre-Christian revelation, as well as the converse.

In speaking of the clearness and consistency of the Roman Catholic doctrine, I must repeat that I refer to a body of ethical teaching which the Church has inherited. I do not refer to the political policy of the Vatican in relation to the present war.

We have drawn our illustrations partly from the official utterances of the Church, and partly from leaders of the Church whose position made them the representative guides of Christian thought in their day; and we have found that since the fourth century the movement of Christian thought and feeling, on the subject of war, has always been towards the position for which Augustine and Aquinas stand. But no lengthy period passed without some energetic assertion of the contrary view. It is extremely important to observe that these protests all converge in principle on the doctrine of non-resistance, interpreted, for men and nations alike, as the duty of meeting violence with entire submission in a spirit of patient endurance. The teaching of Wyclif is a typical and for our purpose a sufficient illustrative example. Wyclif himself does give verbal expression to the view that war is lawful if waged for a just cause, with a righteous intention, against those whose cause is unjust. But his fundamental view is clear. There can be no moral justification for repelling force by force. It matters not if individual persons lose possessions and even life; Christ suffered worse things. It matters not if nations and kingdoms are destroyed; the kingdom of Christ cannot be destroyed. The practical conclusion is that it is not lawful to take up arms even in self-defence. The position is evidently the same in principle as that adopted at a later date by the Society of Friends; with the difference that Wyclif's statements imply a cleavage between Christianity and the State which the Friends, so far as I understand their position, are not prepared to accept.

THE FRENCH ARMY AND DEMOCRACY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I well remember the pain with which we followed the earlier phases of the Dreyfus case, especially in view of the obstinacy which refused to reopen and re-examine a judgment where there was ample reason to suspect a miscarriage of justice. This thing was part of the evil inheritance left by French Imperialism when the army was not under democratic control. I also remember the final triumph and vindication of justice. It was the triumph of a citizen army, the servant of a true democracy. France has now no reason to be ashamed of the Dreyfus case, for, after one of the longest and hardest struggles ever fought for truth and righteousness, the victory was won. But it is not to our credit to refer to what happened as though the wrong had remained unrepented and unrepaired.—Yours, &c.

THE DANGERS OF MILITARISM.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In the willingness of some of your correspondents to welcome the extension and permanence of the military spirit in our midst is there not a little danger of their forgetting (1) That this war was entered upon in order to kill war; (2) That no country on a constitutionally military basis can consistently call itself Christian? Your correspondents may, of course, have counted all this in the cost; but it is as well that we should not lose sight of the aim with which we entered upon this war. Some of us are determined that the shackles of militarism shall never be riveted upon our people, and only acquiesce in military measures as a hateful temporary expedient. We recognise at the same time that the military spirit, once roused, is not easily repressed. Stress has been laid upon the difference between German and French militarism, but any one who recalls what went on at the time of the Dreyfus scandal, must recognise the dangers inherent in the military system anywhere when the worship of the army becomes a cult.—Yours, &c.

'THE FREE CATHOLIC.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I as one formerly a Catholic priest, be permitted to offer a criticism on the movement represented by The Free Catholic? I agree with you in regarding the movement as ill-timed and as calculated to increase "our unhappy divisions," for I cannot agree with Mr. Lloyd Thomas that it is likely to "give expression to the growing sentiment of reunion." But I would venture further. The allusions to the late Father Tyrrell and the general tone of the journal would make it appear that what is known as "Modernism" is to be the gospel of The Free Catholic movement, and this defined I take to be Catholicity without the Pope and Christianity divorced from its historical setting, both of which in my humble judgment are absurdities of the nature of the squared circle. For Catholicity without the Pope is surely the repudiation of infallibility and ultimately of all authority but that of the individual judgment, but this is not Catholicity but Protestantism.

Likewise Christianity divorced from its historical setting, and the Modernist distinction between Jesus and the Christ finally resolve themselves into a vague subjectivism which assumes kaleidoscopic forms. Quot homines, tot sententiæ. I, for one, if unable to accept the genuine historic Catholicity and the theology of, say, St. Thomas Aquinas, prefer the rational Theism or Unitarianism of Martineau and Channing, with their open rejection of sacerdotalism and sacramentalism together with the ritual and ceremonial associated with them. I heartily endorse your remarks about the employment of the word Catholic. It has, in connection with religion, a definite and inalienable connection with the Church in communion with the Pope, and it is misleading to use the term sometimes in that sense and at others in some modern sense. May I conclude by saying that I have with you, sir, the utmost respect for the aims and intentions of the promoters of this movement, even though I am fain to differ from them?—Yours, &c.

'EMERSON AND WATER.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—There is no accounting for taste. For some people 'Emerson and water' may be not only a very palatable but also a very sustaining mixture. I have had many proofs of that in regard to our hymns, assuming that by "our hymns" is meant the hymns commonly sung by us. "What beautiful hymns you have," said a lady to me only a month or two ago, and asked for the loan of a book that she might take it home to show the family that Unitarian worship is not quite the thin and arid thing, to say nothing of the godless thing, that some people imagine it to be. And this lady had been singing sacramentally in orthodox places all her life until a casual visit to our chapel induced her to come and sing with us. She had some knowledge, therefore, of hymns that are not "ours."

I have had that kind of testimony over and over again, in every church I have been connected with, from people like herself. And I may add, not only in regard to our hymns. How often has the same thing been said of the services read by me, but not my own, at baptisms, weddings, and funerals, by persons who have, on these occasions, for the first time in their lives, made acquaintance with—shall I say it?—a Unitarian ministration! The "orthodox" are not repelled by 'Emerson and water,' as these facts show and as other ministers can testify. For mine is no unique ministerial experience. 'Emerson and water' is apparently good enough for them, and it is certainly good enough for me. I thirst for more of it, not for less, in our hymn books. But I shall certainly decline to be dosed with a sacramental infusion.—Yours, &c.

A. CUNLIFFE FOX.

Bath, January 23, 1916.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I express a mild protest against Mr. Whitaker's remark about our hymnals as consisting of 'Emerson and water.' In the course of a fairly long ministry I have repeatedly found that "orthodox" strangers coming to our services have been struck by, and have expressed their admiration of the beauty and elevation of our hymnals. I have known instances where by this more than by anything else some have been led to settle down with us. There is a type of mind to which the pure Theism which was the religion of Jesus, and which He taught, seems weak and cold compared with the "great passionate speech of Christian symbol and devotion." In other words the religious cult about Jesus ranks higher than the religion of Jesus. The Church Universal of all worshipping souls seems chilly beside the narrower "Catholic Church" of sacraments, symbols, and often unreal mystical devotions. The changed hymn 'Father, refuge of my soul' to that type of mind is, I suppose, 'Emerson and water' as compared with 'Jesus, lover of my soul!' Which is nearer to the mind of Jesus I leave others to decide. Of course, there is room for all types and varieties of religious emotion, but let us avoid sneers.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

The Hibbert Journal preserves the free platform and the open mind, though it does not cultivate the kind of neutrality which has no moral preferences. Its task is not an easy one at the present time, and realising the difficulties we can only admire the skill with which it recognizes the fundamental rightness of the Allied cause, and at the same time gives adequate scope to more detached forms of thought and utterance. The result is that the total impression is one of moral encouragement at a time when anything else would seem to most of us little less than a national crime, while no one who has a real contribution to make, and has at the same time purged his mind of mere crankiness, can plead that he is banned. The place of honour in the current issue is rightly given to an article by Count Goblet D'Alviella on 'Some Moral Aspects and Issues of the Present War.' It has gained in importance by the recent promotion of its author to higher rank in the Belgian Government; but many people will welcome it chiefly as an illustration of the way in which a mind of high scholarly training and severe accuracy can be fired by moral passion. It is also the dream of a man who has not lost his optimism in the day of disaster. "I dimly perceive," he writes, "through the smoke of the battlefields the laborious childbirth of a society distinguished by more simplicity in taste, more solidarity between the classes, more moderation in political differences, more toleration in religious questions, more faith in a common ideal; where every one will understand that scientific progress is not enough unless it goes on a par with moral progress; where, finally, the rights of weaker nations and the conquests of human genius will not remain at the mercy of a brutal conqueror." The Bishop of Carlisle contributes a forcible article on the dangers and shortcomings of 'Departmental Religion.' He attributes much of our present moral collapse to the fact that the Church has never striven hard enough to make the State Christian. It has set up a barrier of separation between secular and spiritual departments instead of treating them as belonging equally to God. The same note of accusation, though, we think, with far less robust moral perception, is present in Miss M. E. Robinson's article on 'The Definite Failure of Christianity and How it Might be Retrieved.' Her attempt to banish tragedy from human life with doses of joy has in it the fallacy of all æsthetic and sentimental movements. Her tone of superiority to the clergy is also unpleasing. With all their faults they are not quite so stupid in their methods of dealing with human nature as she imagines. She forgets all the faith and hope and love which exist in the world owing to the steady influence of these despised teachers.

Many of our readers will turn with special interest to Dr. Hargrove's article with the bold title, 'The Warlike Context of the Gospels.' It has in it the historical perspective and the balanced judgment which are so often lacking in discussions of the few passages about non-resistance which the Gospels contain. He gives us the needful warning that the sayings of Jesus were not uttered "in the air." We must not tacitly assume that he "did not consider his audience, their special temptations and wrongs, their ardent beliefs, kindled anew by his own words, that the Kingdom of God was at hand, and the great danger that they would be incited to assure its coming by feeble violence on behalf of it." The whole article will be found full of stimulus and help by people whose minds are confused by the vehement claims of the narrow literalist and feel at the same time, as most good men do, that non-resistance under present circumstances would be an act of moral betrayal. We have only space to make a passing reference to Prof. Armitage's article on 'The Incompetence of the Mere Scholar to Interpret Christianity'—a most suggestive subject which needs rather more breadth of treatment; and one by the Rev. R. H. Law on 'Nationalism and Cosmopolitanism'—an essay written with a wide knowledge of European history leading to the conclusion, "From the agony of Europe the national idea will emerge, strengthened, indeed, but also purified of its baser accretions; and the cosmopolitan idea will be welcomed as its necessary complement and condition." There are the usual useful surveys of recent literature in the departments of Philosophy, Theology, and Social Thought and Service, by Prof. G. Dawes Hicks, Prof. Moffatt, and the Rev. R. P. Farley. These surveys reveal how much the activities of pure scholarship have been limited by the pressure of the war, not, we think, to their ultimate disadvantage. A period of silence and renewal is good even for men who write books.

THE CHALLENGE OF CHRISTIANITY TO A WORLD AT WAR. By E. Griffith Jones, B.A., D.D. London: Duckworth, 2*s.* 6*d.* net.

MANY in these days are asking what Christianity has to say for itself in face of the appalling iniquities and barbarities of the war. But according to the author of this book, it is not Christianity that is on its trial; rather is it a civilisation which, having refused to order itself by Christian principles, is paying the penalty of its refusal in blood and tears. Yet Christianity after the war will be a different thing from what it was before. "The unseen world will be so full of our dearest and best that it will recover its supreme interest for us who still remain here." The war should make a difference, too, in our way of life. "For more than a generation the world has gone mad after physical comfort. We have been living padded lives," but the experience through which we are passing is recalling us to a life simpler and more sternly disciplined. It will be the function of the Churches to minister to such a life. "Let us pray God that when the war is over, nay before then if it please Him, the still and tepid atmosphere of our religious lives may give place to a springtime of spiritual reality and of heroic endeavour!" The volume contains much wholesome and timely suggestion of this kind, and various social problems that have been rendered more acute by the war, such as that of the decreasing birth-rate, are dealt with in a frank and enlightened manner.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. E. S. LANG BUCKLAND.

WE have to announce with deep regret the death of the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, minister at Christ Church, Nottingham, and High Street Church, Ilkeston. Though his friends had known for some time that he was in poor health, it was with a shock of surprise they learned on Friday the 14th inst. that he was suffering from an acute attack of pneumonia from which he would not be able to recover. The disease developed with great rapidity, and Mr. Buckland was practically unconscious until the end, which came at an early hour on Sunday, January 16. The funeral service, held at Christ Church on Wednesday the 19th inst., was conducted by the Rev. John C. Ballantyne. It was attended by several relatives of our late friend, by a number of the ministers of our North Midland churches, Mr. E. Wilford, President of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, and a large number of friends, including several from Derby. The service at the grave was conducted by the Rev. W. E. George, M.A., of Friar Gate Chapel, Derby, of which church Mr. Buckland had been minister for the four years, 1904–8. It may also be added that memorial services were held at Ilkeston, Derby, and Christ Church, Nottingham, on Sunday, January 23.

Mr. Buckland, who came of a Devonshire family, was educated at Lansing College and then at Cambridge, where he showed striking ability and promise. In his second year he abandoned his earlier project of qualifying for the Bar, and decided to enter the ministry, and it was about this same time that he contracted the weakness of the eyes which in later years amounted almost to blindness. From Cambridge he went to Manchester College, Oxford. His first pastorate was at Guildford from 1899 to 1903. He then went to Friar Gate Chapel, Derby, where he was held in high esteem and made many friends. While there he inaugurated and personally conducted a "Mission to the Blind." He was untiring in his labour on behalf of the poor and unfortunate, often spending all he had on their behalf. He retired from the pulpit in Derby in 1908, and for some years devoted himself to work for the blind, and preached occasionally on Sundays. In July, 1915, he was invited to the joint-pastorate of Christ Church, Nottingham, and Ilkeston; but he had become very delicate in health, and his friends soon realised that he could not long sustain the work. The members at Christ Church, and some of those at the High Pavement, cared for him with much neighbourly solicitude, but he grew increasingly frail, and had no resources of strength when he was attacked by his last illness. In many ways it was a pathetic life, especially in the later years. His weakness deprived him of most of the satisfactions of life which are open to other men, and prevented the expression of his own best capabilities. At the same time he possessed a peculiar charm which drew to him men of widely different nature. He had a keen sense of humour which, in its expression, often sparkled, but was invariably kind. Chiefly, however, he will be remembered by reason of his gracious nature, and his courtliness towards all who knew him, and the way he had of saying kindly things.

THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE.

MEETING AT STOCKPORT.

A MEETING of the Manchester District Associate Branch of the Women's League was held at the Unitarian Church, Stockport, on Saturday, January 22, 1916. The proceedings began early in the afternoon with a short service conducted by the Rev. H. E. Perry, when there was a large congregation. In the course of his address Mr. Perry referred to the good effects of physical drill on our young recruits, and pleaded that spiritual drill in the form of religious exercises was equally necessary and beneficial for the health of the soul. He laid special emphasis upon the first object of the League as set forth in its rules, viz. :—"To quicken the religious life of our churches." At 3.15 the Business Meeting was held, when delegates were present from the following Branches :—Ansdell, Bury (Bank Street), Chesham, Blackley, Denton, Dukinfield, Failsworth, Gee Cross, Gorton, Monton, Manchester (Oldham Road), Oldham, Padiham, Pendleton, Stalybridge, Stockport, and Todmorden. Subsequently nearly 300 people had tea in the schoolroom. By this time Mrs. Bernard Allen and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, who attended as a deputation from the Belgian Hospital Fund, had arrived from London, and were accorded a most hearty welcome. After tea Miss Johnstone, the President, introduced Mrs. Allen, and proposed a vote of thanks to her for her visit. In doing so she referred to the interest and enthusiasm with which the local branches of the League had taken up work on behalf of the Belgian Hospitals. She also welcomed a new Branch of the League which had recently been formed at Oldham Road Church, Manchester, into fellowship. This brings the number in the Manchester district up to thirty. The resolution was seconded by Mrs. Stead, the Treasurer, who voiced the sentiments of all present when she said how anxious they had been to meet Mrs. Allen, whose name was so closely associated with the work in which they were engaged. Miss Shaw, of Todmorden, proposed a cordial vote of thanks to the Branch at Stockport for their most generous hospitality. It was seconded by Mrs. Prosser of Blackley. Mrs. Perry responded on behalf of the hosts. Mrs. Allen also expressed the great pleasure she felt in meeting so many friends whose names were known to her by correspondence. Owing to the large attendance the evening meeting was held in the church, which was quite full. The Rev. H. E. Perry presided. Mrs. Allen gave a delightful address on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund, and described the steady growth of its activities from its small beginnings, a year ago, to the important position which it holds to-day. The Rev. W. H. Drummond followed with a short address, in which he emphasised the splendid business organisation of the Fund under Mrs. Allen's supervision, and the feeling of common interest which the work had produced in the churches and the branches of the Women's League all over the country. The keenest interest was shown, and the meeting was, in every way, a highly successful one. The best comment upon it is contained in the remark of one member who was heard to say, "Eh, doesn't it make you feel you want to help." The collection for the Belgian Hospital Fund amounted to £20.

OUR SOLDIERS IN THE HOME CAMPS.

THE REV. T. P. SPEDDING writes :—It was one of our Lancashire ministers whose letter led to the effort now being made to visit the soldiers in the Home Camps, who are associated with one or other of our churches and schools. Half a dozen men from Padiham had been looking for the Unitarian Chapel, which they supposed ought to be somewhere in their neighbourhood. Their search was in vain. In these circumstances could not something be done for these men, and for others similarly situated? The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association replied to the inquiry by obtaining, through the President, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., special facilities through the War Office for the visitation of the men in the Home Camps. The co-operation of ministers was also sought, and in due course hundreds of names and addresses of men in the camps were received, and of scores of wounded men in hospitals all over the land. Some ministers and superintendents had already sent names to ministers in places where there were churches, and these names have now been supplemented from the new lists, with a view to helpful co-operation, and especially so as to secure that the men should be seen at the earliest opportunity. These lists have been sent to between sixty and seventy ministers, and some reports are already to hand stating the pleasure with which the visits have been received. In some places the men are taking an active share in the work of the school or church which has welcomed them.

Over a hundred camps remain for visitation in districts where we have no churches, and the number grows as further lists come in. About a hundred lists of men have been received, and others are promised as soon as the information is available. Among the men themselves the visits, actual and prospective, have created lively interest. Word is sent to them, and they are asked to confirm the information as to their whereabouts, and the best time for seeing them. The replies come, sometimes with a letter in addition to the stamped post card, conveying very careful instructions, e.g., that the nearest railway station is five miles away, "and it would be a lovely walk in summer-time, but the roads are dreadful now. There is no bus either." Arrived at the camp the guard, perhaps, knows you because word has gone round that "So and so's minister is coming to-day," and there must be no mistake about his finding his man. There is not a camp in the country where we should have the necessary 15 per cent of men to warrant the appointment of a chaplain of our own; but it is evident from the way in which these friendly calls are received, in London or the country, in camp or hospital, that our men appreciate the fact that there is some one from their own church to say "How do you do" to them.

May I add that lists not yet sent in should be forwarded as soon as possible, as it is scarcely likely that more than one visit to each camp will be possible, and I should be sorry if the names came too late for inclusion in the itinerary.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Subscribers and Friends of the College was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on January 26. In the unavoidable absence of the President, Mr. R. D. Holt, M.P., on account of Parliamentary duties, the chair was taken by Mr. F. W. Monks. There were present, among others, Mrs. Hans Renold, Miss Winser, the Revs. H. E. Dowson, C. J. Street, E. L. H. Thomas, W. G. Cadman, A. H. Dolphin, A. Hall, J. Ellis, H. E. Haycock; W. T. Bushrod, G. Payne, and Messrs. Lawton, Hall Brooks, Shaw, Chadwick, and D. Little. Mr. Monks, in his opening remarks, spoke of the great pleasure that was felt by the consent of the Rev. Alex. Gordon to the wish of the Committee to nominate him for the Presidency for the ensuing year.

The report records a satisfactory year's work in all departments, and special mention is made of the gratitude which is due to the Principal, Dr. Mellone, to the Warden, the Rev. H. McLachlan, and Mrs. McLachlan. It is stated that in the careful management of the house a due regard has been shown to the economy necessary at this time. The library has been much enriched during the year by a very valuable gift of 460 volumes in various departments of literature by Mr. G. W. R. Wood; 58 duplicate volumes from the library have been presented to the collection of books which is being made for the University of Louvain. Unfortunately, the Treasurer's statement of accounts shows some shrinkage of income. New and increased subscriptions amount to £10 9*s.* 6*d.*; but there is a loss of £61 16*s.* through deaths and discontinued subscriptions. The attention of all friends of the College is called to the need of making this good.

In moving the adoption of the Report the Chairman mentioned that a number of students would be coming in next year, and among them would be two ladies. He spoke of the gratification felt by the Committee on account of the successful year's work. The Rev. C. J. Street seconded the motion, and referred with pleasure to the fact that the question of enlisting in the army had been left entirely to the decision of each individual student. He also made a protest against the sham generosity which withdraws subscriptions from old and needy causes in favour of new funds. The new should be helped and the old also. The Rev. H. E. Dowson moved the appointment of the Officers and Committee. He paid a tribute of personal affection to the Rev. Alexander Gordon, and testified to the universal admiration accorded to him. Among so many names that he would like to dwell upon he felt he must stay to mention that of the late Mr. William Long, whose hospitality and unfailing kindness had made him beloved by many. He wished also to voice the feeling of regret of all that Mr. Percy Winser was no longer able to continue his valuable work as Secretary.

The Chairman then moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Winser upon his retirement from the lay Secretaryship. This was seconded by the Rev. G. A. Payne, who testified to the time and labour Mr. Winser had put into his work.

The Principal, Dr. Mellone, moved a resolution of thanks to the Visitors of the College, and to all who had helped, including the Hon. Medical Advisers, Drs. Larmouth and Emrys Jones, and to the Gaskell and Harry Rawson Examiners. This was seconded by the Rev. John Ellis. On the motion of the Warden, the Rev. H. S. McLachlan, it was decided to alter Rule III. so as to unify the Reports in future by making them cover identical years. A vote of thanks to the Chairman concluded the business.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE new series of Hibbert Lectures in Comparative Religion will be given, in English, by Prof. Louis de la Vallée Poussin (Professeur de Sanscrit et de Grammaire Comparée à l'Université de Gand; Membre de l'Académie royale de Belgique), on Thursdays, at 5 P.M., during the present term, beginning on February 3. The subject will be 'Buddhism as Discipline and Salvation,' and the lecturer will deal with the origins of the Buddhist idea of salvation, the doctrine of salvation in the old and the later Buddhism, philosophy (metaphysical speculation) in the old and later Buddhism as a part of the doctrine of salvation, and Buddhist and Christian views as compared or contrasted. The Hibbert Lectures in Metaphysics will be given by Prof. J. A. Smith on Fridays, at 5 o'clock, the subject being 'The Nature of Spirit and its Life.'

SERBIAN RELIEF FUNDS.

To avoid any possibility of confusion in the administration of contributions intended for the benefit of the distressed Serbian population, the Serbian Legation requests that subscriptions intended for the Serbian Relief Fund, of which H.M. the Queen is Patroness, should be sent to the Earl of Desart, K.C.B., at the Offices of the Fund, 5, Cromwell Road, South Kensington, S.W. The Serbian Legation will continue to receive subscriptions for the following Serbian Funds: — 1. The Archbishop of Belgrade's Fund for the families of the killed and wounded soldiers; 2. The Society of the Serbian Red Cross; 3. The Parliamentary Commission for the Refugees; 4. The Society of St. Helena for the orphans whose parents have been killed in the war. All contributions addressed to the Serbian Legation (195, Queen's Gate, London, S.W.), for these Funds will be gratefully received and acknowledged.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Canterbury.—To-day, Saturday, January 29, 1916, our old friend the Rev. Cyril Abdy Greaves, M.A., D.C.L., now of Sturry, near Canterbury, completes his 85th year. He is well in health and mind, but feeble in bodily powers, and very deaf. He is the "Father" of the Canterbury King's School, and, he thinks, of Durham University. Dr. Greaves has sent us the following birthday wish: "May the younger generations of clergy and laity exceed in zeal and usefulness the departing one. May God's peace come and come quickly."

Dean Row.—The following resolution was passed at the Annual Meeting of Dean Row Chapel, held on Sunday, January 23rd: "The congregation has heard with regret of the death of the Rev. George Fox, who was for many years their fellow worshipper. Though his great age prevented his attendance during the last few years his love for the old chapel never failed, and his constant sympathetic interest has been greatly valued and will make the loss a very real one."

London: Acton.—Mr. H. C. Horsley, B.A., Manchester College, Oxford, has received and accepted a very cordial invitation to become minister of the congregation at Acton.

Preston.—The congregation has been fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. J. W. Bishop as temporary pastor on the enlistment of the Rev. Mortimer Rowe, which took place last week, Mr. Rowe having recently taken the necessary certificate to qualify for enlistment in the R.A.M.C. On the preceding Sunday, Mr. Bishop commenced his duties, preaching morning and evening to good congregations, and Mr. Rowe conducted the devotional part of the services. A few days later Mr. Rowe enlisted in conjunction with the Rev. W. G. Price of Hale, and both are doing duty for the present as ward orderlies at the 2nd Western General Hospital, Princess Street, Manchester. Mr. and Mrs. Bishop received a cordial and appreciative welcome on their first appearance at Preston.

Stalybridge.—The Annual Meeting of the congregation was held at the close of evening service, on Sunday evening last, January 23, Mr. W. Thompson (Warden) presiding. The fiftieth report, presented by the Secretary (Mr. E. Storrs), showed that, in spite of the war and the unsettlement consequent on holding services in the school-room whilst alterations to the church fabric were in progress, interest was well maintained. The church membership stands at 262 adults, and 55 juniors, and the number of scholars and teachers in the Sunday school is 297. The Balance Sheet (Mr. J. Matley, Treasurer) was very satisfactory, and showed that in addition to maintaining the church and its numerous institutions in a state of efficiency, substantial contributions had been made to our denominational organisations, and to the support of Belgian refugees, Belgian and French hospitals, Red Cross societies, the district infirmary, &c. This being the jubilee year of the church, it was decided to celebrate the same by the erection of a new organ, alteration and improvement of the church fabric, installation of electric light, and general decoration and renovation. The structural alterations have already been carried out in accordance with plans kindly prepared by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A. The whole scheme could not be undertaken at the present time, but so far as it has gone, the effect has been a complete transformation of the interior, the chancel adding beauty and repose. The new organ is promised early in March next. As soon as it is completed we shall further celebrate the jubilee by Special Services, Organ Recitals, and Reunion Meetings. All scattered friends who have been associated with the church are cordially invited to rally on March 18 and 19. The Warden congratulated the congregation on the achievements thus far accomplished, and anticipated good results from the addition to the warmth and adornments of the House of Prayer and Fellowship. The Minister (the Rev. John Ellis) expressed profound thankfulness for the loyalty and support of a united and devoted people, and the belief that, with their continued confidence and willing assistance, an even greater work for God and man might be accomplished in the difficult times that are before us. The officers and committee were heartily thanked for their services, and re-elected.

Winnipeg—All Souls' Church.—Dr. Westwood started the winter season with a series of Sunday evening lectures on 'Prophets of Modern Times,' beginning on November 14 with Thomas Carlyle, then Nietzsche, Karl Marx, Charles Darwin, Henry George and Tolstoy, and closing on December 26 with 'Jesus of Nazareth—the Contemporary of All the Christian Centuries.' The series was well attended, and several new members have joined the church from among his hearers. At each service a five-minute talk was given on cardinal points of our Unitarian affirmations, and these have roused considerable attention. Dr. Westwood also contributes a weekly article to The Winnipeg Tribune setting out many of the points where our church has a positive message for the present time. Free literature has been available at the church during the season, and this opportunity has been taken by many visitors and over five hundred pamphlets have been disposed of. The Sunday School has increased from twenty-one to thirty-nine children, and there is a distinct feeling that public interest in our movement is growing in the community, and, in spite of the hardships due to general depression and the losses owing to so many leaving the city, the coming year is looked forward to with hope and confidence.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

UNUSED VODKA.

In the course of a discussion on the report of the Estimates of the Excise and Liquor Department of the Ministry of Finance in Russia, it was pointed out that there was still in the country a vast stock of State vodka, amounting to something like 260 million gallons. This, as M. Grinevitch said, constituted a public danger, and he recommended either its export or (in the war zone) its destruction. M. Bark, the Minister of Finance, in the course of an important speech, indicated a scheme for the utilisation of spirit for technical purposes. He was, however, entirely in favour, he said, of destroying the existing stock of vodka, and declared categorically that the Government did not intend to return to the old state of affairs after the war is over. It is, indeed, now engaged in drawing up a Bill on the lines suggested by forty-five members of the Duma for the maintenance of temperance for all time. This Bill has already met with the sympathy of the entire Council of Members, and vodka will, in accordance with the Tsar's wish expressed to M. Bark, "be totally prohibited for ever." A Deputy alluded to the inadequacy of mere prohibition for the spread of temperance, and recommended the establishment of popular libraries and similar institutions by the local public authorities as a means of combating the vodka craving.

"Flying Sickness."

In an article on the influence of altitude on the nervous system, the Lancet has recently discussed the symptoms of "flying sickness," a sufficiently new condition to awaken some interest, comparing it with "mountain sickness," which, apparently, is rather different. In high altitudes profound lassitude, intense headache feverishness, accelerated respiration, and occasional spasmodic gulping of air like fishes when taken out of water are experienced; but the pilot who is lifted from his machine, after rapid vol-planing, in a semi-conscious condition, falling thereafter into a deep sleep, shows a phenomenon not met with either in cases of mountain sickness or the sickness which follows work in caissons during bridge building. Some light may be thrown on this fact by Edward Whymper, who, in his 'Scrambles Among the Alps,' states that on one occasion he slipped and fell about 200 feet in seven or eight bounds. Curious as it may appear, though conscious at first, he "was like a patient under chloroform and experienced no pain," albeit badly cut about the head. The bounding through space did not feel disagreeable, and he is of opinion that "death by a fall from a great height is as painless an end as can be experienced."

"Notes from the Foreign Press."

In Notes from the Foreign Press, which is edited by Mrs. C. R. Buxton, and incorporated with the Cambridge Magazine, an attempt has been made for some months to give a number of extracts from the leading journals of other countries, whether neutral or belligerent, which are not intended so much to offer a comprehensive survey of the opinions prevailing in those countries, as to supplement the statements, necessarily to a great extent one-sided, to be found in the English papers. This is a very useful piece of work, and we venture to think that Mrs. Buxton is doing her country a public service in translating for us these expressions of opinion by men of all parties in the European press, which help towards a clearer understanding both of the attitude towards the war taken by different leaders of thought, and of the political and other problems which await solution at the end of the war. The last number just to hand contains, among other things, a verbatim translation of speeches by the German Social Democratic leaders in the Reichstag debates of December, which have not been quoted in this country as extensively, of course, as those of the Imperial Chancellor.

The Revival of the Herb-Garden.

We have referred in these columns to the demand for medicinal herbs which have, in recent years, been largely obtainable from Germany, Austria-Hungary, and the Balkans, and the opportunity thus offered to women of enterprise and horticultural tastes. In the old days England used to grow most of its own drugs, the herbalist was a person of considerable repute in country places, and a knowledge of simples was regarded by saintly George Herbert as part of the necessary equipment of the parish priest. The idea of organising classes and clubs in agricultural districts for the study of herbs and the encouragement of their cultivation as marketable produce is attracting a good many people at the present time, and several societies have already been formed in this connection. The Women's Farm and Garden Union is giving instructions as to the best use of cottage gardens and small holdings, and advocating that some portion of ground should be devoted to the growing of medicinal herbs, and the Women's Herb Growing Association, formed a month ago, and affiliated to the Union, has drawn up a list of plants which it is most profitable to cultivate. Miss Alice Sandford, a member of the committee of the new Association, points out that prices are already going up by leaps and bounds, and unless something is done the use of the most important drugs will soon be possible only to the wealthy. There is evidently money to be made by herb-growing, and, what is more, health to be gained, and something of the old delightful intimacy with nature restored in an atmosphere fragrant with balm and rosemary.

Women Astronomers.

Five ladies have been elected Fellows of the Royal Astronomical Society, which was instituted in the year 1820 for the encouragement and promotion of astronomy, and has always excluded women up to the present year from the privileges of Fellowship. Women eminent in the science like Caroline Herschel, Mary Somerville, Miss Anne Sheepshanks, Lady Huggins, Miss Agnes Clarke, and a few others, have been chosen as hon. members, but it is now open to any woman to put her name forward, if she finds the necessary sponsors, to seek election. A supplementary charter has been procured by the Society to make such an election valid.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

AT the Meeting of the National Conference Committee held in Manchester last week a resolution was carried unanimously commending the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund to the sympathy and support of all the Congregations on the Roll. We need hardly say how much we appreciate this gracious act of recognition. We hope that it will make the appeal of the Fund heard in some quarters which hitherto have sent all their help elsewhere. We have never desired for a single moment to monopolise the generosity of either individuals or congregations; but it has seemed fitting that those who are joined together by common religious ties and have a splendid tradition of public philanthropy to uphold, should unite in some special branch of service and carry it through with all the energy and generosity at their command. We are convinced that this common work in which we are engaged will remain as a spiritual bond long after the special need has passed away. Men and women are being drawn closer together in their eagerness to help; new friendships are being formed; we are learning to see many things in a new light, and in the end the whole religious life of the churches will be enriched.

IT is a pleasant coincidence that the week which has brought us this recognition from the National Conference has also been marked by various incidents which reveal the cordial regard which our work has inspired among members of the Belgian Government, and, perhaps, we may add a growing sense of its magnitude and importance. Mr. Kelland, who is at present in France, has had opportunities of discussing various matters in influential quarters, with the result that our work is not likely to grow less. We have established a reputation and we shall have to live up to it. Nor will this be difficult if only we are careful to remember how ample are our resources compared with the privations of this brave people in exile.

THE doctor in charge of one of the colonies of Belgian refugee children visited Mrs. Allen this week and discussed the whole situation with her. Many of them are sick, and properly equipped dormitories are much needed. Fifty cots and fifty children's beds of a larger size have been ordered, and will be sent out as soon as possible. They will bring cleanliness and comfort in a place where it has been impossible to avoid crowding and confusion. We appeal to the mothers among our readers, remembering the love and care which surround their own little ones, to help us to pay the bill. Would not the children in some of our own happy homes like to send a little of their own pocket money for the same purpose?

Two letters which have come to hand this week contain passages which we are anxious to hand on to our readers. The first is from Mr. Ronald P. Jones, who is at present engaged in erecting a large Y.M.C.A. hut, of which he is the generous donor, in connection with an important camp in the Eastern Counties. "I have seen from experience here," he writes, "what an absolutely essential thing the Y.M.C.A. hut is, and how impossible it would be to run these big camps without them, so that anything of the same sort for the Belgian soldiers is sure to be equally welcome and useful." Mr. Jones has sent us £50 towards the cost of the recreation hut for which we appealed last week. The other passage is from an English nurse who is doing important work at one of the Belgian Convalescent Depots in France. She writes as follows:—"I received yesterday four bales and two cases through Mr. Kelland at Calais. The things are perfectly splendid, just what we want. Thank you most awfully for them. What a lot of suffering your fund has and does relieve."

THE newspapers are full of the Zeppelin raid. For a few days this fresh exhibition of the German temper has assumed an importance in our eyes far greater that we can justly give to it. It is natural, for this indiscriminate murder of the civilian population may at any moment touch our own homes. We are none of us safe from these marauders in the sky, and we ourselves may be the victims next time. We must take our chance and stand firm; and that is just what everybody is doing. We have proved once more how futile is this policy of intimidation. The bombastic accounts which have appeared in the German papers are themselves a confession of weakness. Men who are doing strong and effective things do not need to invent lies. No doubt many people in Germany believe what they are told, and comfort themselves with a picture of England devastated by fire from heaven, her industry crippled, and her people cowering with fear. How will it be when they learn the truth that they have burned a few happy homes, and cut off little children in the midst of their play, and only made the Allies more determined to make no terms with a spirit so ruthless and inhuman?

WE are glad to see that voices are being raised both in France and England against the cry for "reprisals" by barbarous attacks on undefended towns in Germany and the slaughter of civilians, including women and children. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, writing to The Times, suggests that if we bombard Bonn, Frankfort, Cologne, and other places then the Germans will cease to attack Paris and London. "There should be no limit," he says "to the bombardment of these towns," and he adds, "When the French began to retaliate at Karlsruhe and Heidelberg, several German journals at once announced that such warfare was inhuman, and it has as a matter of fact been discontinued—for France." The recent raid on Paris has shown the utter futility of his argument. If the Prussian military authorities think that anything is to be gained by their Zeppelin raids on England, they certainly will not be deterred either by our threatening to kill, or actually killing, their women and children, or destroying Cologne Cathedral.

BUT there are other and higher reasons against any such proceeding on our part. Sir Edward Clarke and others have written protesting earnestly against "lowering ourselves to the German level by copying the crimes which they have committed," and a leading article in the Literary Supplement of The Times for January 20 points out that "every barbarous thing printed in England which can be quoted against England" only strengthens the German people in their resolution "to resist foes so barbarous," and adds "It also makes neutrals doubt that we are so much better than the Germans as we think." M. Gustave Herve writing in L'Œuvre, protests against "stupid reprisals which would massacre innocent children"; and L'Humanité asks, "How can the Allies claim a moral superiority over the enemy if they take to the same unpardonable savagery of killing women and children in their beds?"

THE result of the recent Labour Congress in Bristol may be accepted as satisfactory. An impartial observer, with a gift of humour, might easily make fun of the inconsistency of the resolutions which were passed with such overwhelming majorities. Here, he might say, are men who do not know their own minds, and tie themselves up in futile contradictions in the face of the enemy. But this is not really so when we distinguish between the resolutions which are intended to be operative and those which simply re-affirm the general principles, which in normal times have been an important plank in the Labour platform. The deep-seated loyalty to these principles, and to the very form of words in which they are usually expressed, was not allowed to cripple the policy of union and strong action in face of grave danger. The net result is that Labour has given its vote for a vigorous prosecution of the war; that there is to be no disintegrating campaign against the Military Service Law; and that the Labour members are to retain their posts in the Government.

THE curtailment of imports which has been announced, ought to do something to encourage thrift by drying up the source of supply of many luxuries. It is doubtful, however, whether the effect will extend very far without some further increase of taxation. The surplus money will have little difficulty in finding fresh channels so long as it is there and burns a hole in people's pockets. We are confronted by two difficulties. There is first of all the difficulty created by the daily habits of people accustomed to good living and free spending. To them a certain scale of personal expenditure seems necessary, and public warnings have made so little impression upon them that they take no steps to lower it voluntarily. The other difficulty arises from the wide diffusion of unaccustomed wealth in the country, and the impossibility of checking the desire to spend it so long as there is a display of desirable things to tempt the buyer. We must accordingly look for our chief remedy in a further increase of taxation. In no other way is it possible to inhibit the citizen from spending money on his personal tastes which it is imperative that he should spend on the war. In other words, we must be forced to buy munitions for national defence before we buy cakes and ale for our private pleasure.

FIFTEEN years ago the Rev. Hubert Handley caused a good deal of fluttering in ecclesiastical dovecotes with a book named 'The Fatal Opulence of Bishops.' He has returned to the charge in an article on 'The War and Episcopal Penitence' in the current number of The Nineteenth Century. Once again he bids the church, in which he has served so long and faithfully, remember that her worldly state and her episcopal palaces are a serious hindrance to her spiritual work, and make many of her appeals for penitence and plain living ring hollow.

> The country [he writes] is in the furnace of trial. Things thriving before will not now exist in the heat. Old bad fashions, the growths of ease and prosperity, will be burnt up; luxury, softness, grossness, voluptuousness, vulgarity, display, are already scorched; they begin to crackle and shrink before wounds, agony, death, anxiety, loss, wonder, grief. And the Church? Ought not the Church, too, to be purified seven times in the fire? When the earth is shaking and divine judgments are abroad, is the Church of England alone to go on impenitent? thick-skinned? ordinary? content with the old commonplaces, the old catchwords, the old party scratches, the old detachment from us of thoughtful men, the old aversion from us of the Labour Movement, the old estrangement of the masses, the old mental inanition of the Theological Colleges, the old mental thinness of the clergy, the old sad destitution and pinch of hidden, unworldly incumbents, the old mundane glories of the Bishops?

We do not quote this scorching indictment in order to point the finger of rebuke. It is true in some measure of us all. Has the ministry of any Church realised what is taking place in the earth? The old routine continues. The old demand is made that religion should run itself into the moulds of doctrine and ritual which we have prepared for it. Is there no danger that all this new life which is surging around us, so brimful of fellowship and heroism and sacrifice, may turn away from us because it cannot understand our language or use our traditional forms?

A SERBIAN priest, Dr. Velmirovich of Belgrade, preached recently in a London church, on the martyrdom of his country. The following prayer, with which he closed his sermon, has in it a note of sincerity and simple trust which will help many hearts. We quote from the report in The Guardian:—

> We pray to Thee, our Father, in order not to change Thy will but ours. Thy will be done! If Serbia is an impediment to human civilisation and an evil, as our German brothers think, Father, make of Serbia a salt lake before they make of her a cemetery. Yet Thy will be done and not ours. We are Thine in our righteousness and in our sins. What is, indeed, the whole of our planet? A small grain of dust. What are we, then, on this small grain of dust? We men, either great or little? We nations, rich or poor? We, the Churches, either right or wrong? One word only I dare to say: the silence in Thy presence shall be our name and our prayer. Even on the brightest and most peaceful day of our life there is no true light except Thee. How much more we need Thy light in the darkness of the present moment! We are a small grain of dust under Thy throne, but remember the only grain of dust which can consciously worship Thee. That shall be our only glory and pride among our brothers—animals, plants, and stones. But in worshipping Thee we become fellows of the stars. O Lord, be our everlasting sun, and cast Thy light on every star, now and for ever. Amen.

IN GOODLY COMPANY.

At any time it would be a matter of deep interest to us to hear that Mr. Robert Bridges had compiled an anthology. The fairest flowers have for us a richer fragrance when they are gathered by one who is himself poet and thinker. He offers us his gift, not so much as the editor of the fair thoughts of other minds, but as the revealer of the spiritual quality of his own. And so the ordinary instincts of the critic for once retire into the background. We do not scan the index in order to note the omissions, and feel a thrill of triumph as our list grows of the things which certainly ought to have been there. Our mood is one of happy surrender to a teacher, who has chosen this medium in order to impart to us the secret of faith and vision, of consolation and delight. But under present circumstances our lively interest is turned at once into the fine gold of gratitude. Our Poet Laureate, with little taste for official verse, has chosen the modest part of an interpreter. In doing so he has opened wide the treasure-house of his own heart. Here, in the words of other men, is the reflection of his own mood as he faces the tragedy of the hour. "Whatever merit or attractive quality it may have," he says in speaking of this book, "will lie in its being the work of one mind at one time; and its being such implies the presence of the peculiarities and blemishes that mark any personality and any time." But this reflection of his mood—or would it not be better to say of the moods of melancholy, of mortal sorrow, of sympathy and triumph, of which we are all conscious?—is also a revelation of his faith. His confidence in God is still quiet and assured. It lies like mellowing sunshine upon the hard ground of our own hearts and the blood-stained fields of the world. "Spirituality is the basis and foundation of human life," he explains in another illuminating sentence in his Preface, "....It must underlie everything. To put it briefly, man is a spiritual being, and the proper work of his mind is to interpret the world according to his higher nature, and to conquer the material aspects of the world so as to bring them into subjection to the spirit."

This is hardly the language of ordinary religious teaching. In some respects it goes deeper. It recognises that the assurance that men need is this, that the forces of the spirit are still supreme. Goodness and love have not been choked by the poisonous gases of violence and ill-will. Sacrifice, as it drives men forth to the harvest of death, unbars the gates of immortal power:—

A power from the unknown God,
A Promethean conqueror came,
Like a triumphal path he trod
  The thorns of death and shame.
  A mortal shape to him
  Was like the vapour dim
Which the orient planet animates with light.

This and a hundred other snatches of undying verse in Mr. Bridges's volume may not be the authentic voice of the Christian Church, but they have this advantage, that they have not been worn with use or lost the vividness of their appeal to the living mind. We can hardly speak of faith or divine grace or use the sacramental language of the Church without explanation, and, perhaps more than a little risk of misunderstanding. Many of the noblest and sincerest men of our own day fail to recognise that it fits in any way what they know is passing in their own souls. But here they find themselves, and they would learn with genuine surprise that this is what their religious teachers, with the stiff formality of their language, meant all the time.

To this need this collection will continue to minister long after the special occasion which called it forth has passed. The fine taste and the breadth of sympathy which have guided the selection and arrangement, and the personal touch in the notes, will give it a long lease of life. But it is chiefly a book for the hour, and that is its animating purpose. While other men argue with us or try to solve the dark riddle of struggle and pain, the poet takes us by the hand and guides us into the fellowship of faithful and enkindled souls, "whose sayings are the oracles and prophecies of loveliness and loving-kindness."

"Common diversions," he reminds us, "divert us no longer; our habits and thoughts are searched by the glare of the conviction that man's life is not the case that a peace-loving generation has found it or thought to make it, but the awful conflict with evil which philosophers and saints have depicted; and it is in their abundant testimony to the good and beautiful that we find support for our faith and distraction from a grief that is intolerable constantly to face, nay, impossible to face without that trust in God which makes all things possible."

But to provide distraction is the least part of his purpose, though to pace the courts of heaven even for a few moments restores to us serenity of mind for the earthly conflict and keeps us from growing bitter and hard. Above every other need is the power of finding God, as a real presence, at the heart of our struggle, the sense of his nearness to us when the personal will and its cares are lost in some act of complete surrender and obedience. To know that we are called to be vindicators of truth and right is to escape from the crippling sense of failure and incapacity, and to renew in our own lives the glad confidence of victory.

> "Here we stand upright and above reproach: and to show ourselves worthy will be more than consolation, for truly it is the hope of men's great desire, the desire for brotherhood and universal peace to men of good-will, that is at stake in this struggle.... We can therefore be happy in our sorrows, happy even in the death of our beloved who fall in the fight; for they die nobly, as heroes and saints die, with hearts and hands unstained by hatred and wrong."

These are not the words of vain boastfulness. Rather they have in them the simplicity inseparable from all clear vision of the will of God. For many of us they express the high nobility which we have seen in other men, and the desire of our hearts that we may be numbered among them. We know not what forms religion may take after society has been shaken to its foundations and everything we have ever valued has been tested in the fire, but this at least is certain, that the chief factor in the spiritual renewal of the world will be the experience of men and women who triumphed over their own sorrows, because they recognised the divine mastery of duty and love, and amid the tumult of evil passions kept

Death is the veil which those who live call life:
They sleep, and it is lifted: and meanwhile
In mild variety the seasons mild
With rainbow-skirted showers, and odorous winds,
And long blue meteors cleansing the dull night,
And the life-kindling shafts of the keen sun's
All-piercing bow, and the dew-mingled rain
Of the calm moonbeams, a soft influence mild,
Shall clothe the forests and the fields, ay, even
The crag-built deserts of the barren deep,
With ever-living leaves, and fruit, and flowers. SHELLEY.

GREAT and sacred is obedience. He who is not able, in the highest majesty of manhood, to obey, with clear and open brow, a law higher than himself, is barren of all faith and love, and tightens his chains, moreover, in the struggle to be free. A childlike trust of heart, that can take a hand, and wondering walk in paths unknown and strange, is the prime requisite of all religion. Let the Great Shepherd lead; and by winding ways, not without green pastures and still waters, we shall climb insensibly, and reach the tops of the everlasting hills, where the winds are cool and the sight is glorious.

Be Thou all things to all men, knowing each one and his petition, each house and its need. Save us waking and guard us sleeping, that waking we may walk in the steps of Jesus, and sleeping we may rest in peace. Amen.

THE CHURCH AND WAR, IN ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES.

III.

THE Protestant Churches have in the main regarded war in the light of the principles laid down by Augustine. Luther makes the striking comparison of a just war to a necessary surgical operation, and adds that we must look at it with the eyes of men, and not with the eyes of children who see only the immediate evil. None the less, in typical Protestant utterances from within the Churches, just at those critical occasions where a clear and strong expression of the collective mind of the Church should be available for the guidance of the world, we find a wavering and hesitancy which suggest a fatal failure to grasp principles or a fear of going too far in their application. The difficulties are probably inherent in the very nature of Protestantism, and are partly the defects of qualities otherwise good. Protestantism in effect has treated the individual conscience as practically infallible, and at the same time has imposed on that conscience the authority of an infallible book. There is no corporate body with power to express the living mind of the Church. We are given a series of utterances of individual thought and feeling, each definite and decided, and worthy of all respect, but obviously incapable of affording the guidance that the world needs.

Let us turn to the official declarations of those two Protestant bodies which amid all their differences resemble one another in being the most fully organised communions in Christendom, the Anglican and Presbyterian Churches. The thirty-seventh of the Articles of the Church of England contains a reference to war. In the original Latin, and in the English version of 1552, the Article states that "it is lawful for Christian men, at the command of the magistrate, to bear arms and serve in lawful wars (justa bella)." Since 1562, the word "lawful" has been omitted before "wars." The late Prof. D. G. Ritchie, when he pointed out the change, suggested that perhaps the English bishops and Queen Elizabeth's government came to recognise the inconvenience of leaving it to the individual conscience, no longer guided by a Church that claimed infallibility, to decide which wars were just and which were not. With this he contrasts the statement in chapter xxiii. of the Westminster Confession: "It is lawful for Christians to accept and execute the office of magistrate, when called thereunto; in the managing whereof, as they ought specially to maintain piety, justice, and peace, according to the wholesome laws of each commonwealth, so for that end they may lawfully, now under the New Testament, wage war upon just and necessary occasions." The whole meaning of this declaration turns on the points which are left to the individuals' judgment to decide. What laws are "wholesome?" What occasions are "just and necessary?"

The last witness whom I shall call is Jonathan Dymond, whose "Essays on the Principles of Morality" ran through at least nine editions, one of which is distinguished by a commendatory preface written by John Bright. Under "the peaceable precepts of the New Testament" he finds that all war, even in self-defence, is condemned absolutely. The author was a most worthy tradesman, owning a prosperous linen-drapery business in Exeter, and accordingly he does not, like Tolstoi, take the words "Resist not evil" as forbidding not merely war but all use of force on behalf of morality and social order. Far from it: "It is the duty of the civil magistrate," he says, "to repress the violence of one man towards another, and by consequence it is the duty of the individual, when the civil power cannot operate, to endeavour to repress it himself. Many kinds of resistance to aggression come strictly within the fulfilment of the law of benevolence. He who by securing or temporarily disabling a man prevents him from committing an act of great turpitude, is certainly his benefactor. It is an act of much kindness to a bad man to secure for him the penalties of the law." If a wretched tramp steals a handkerchief from Jonathan Dymond's shop, the reply is—gaol under the strong arm of the law. If Napoleon threatens the liberties and commerce of Europe, and of England above the rest (Dymond's first edition was published in 1829), the reply is, sit down and meditate on "the peaceable precepts of the New Testament." It is not my desire to ridicule a book which must have been useful to many, as its large circulation shows, and which attracted the favourable notice of such a man as Bright. But the writer's use of the New Testament betrays a lack of logic and imagination, and this defect

I seem to find pervading a great deal of what is called "pacificist" speech and writing to-day. Jonathan Dymond believes in the legitimacy of industry and trade under a system of "free competition"; he perceives the necessity of a State with authority and power to guarantee the individual "liberty" that such a system, or no system, implies. But he is blind to the whole range of problems which spring out of the existence of the State in its relation to other States, and the most dangerous of these problems arise from the expansion of that competitive commercial system which he supposes to be sanctioned by the New Testament. Such a system means economic war both within nations and between them. And so long as this economic war continues all attempts to ensure political peace, within nations or between them, seem destined to become exhibitions of well-meaning but disastrous futility. This war will compel us to come to an understanding on the position and functions of the State, and yet this is what we, with our English love of living in matters of principle "from hand to mouth," are stubbornly unwilling to do. And this problem is not to be settled by quoting texts from the New Testament.

It may be said, can you imagine Jesus Christ treating this subject as you have treated it? I cannot. Why not? Because I have made a brief cross-examination of history in order to see whether some guiding or warning general principle cannot be obtained. Such an attempt is inevitably analytical and critical, and wholly foreign to what the Gospel provides. As well might it be asked whether we can imagine the Gospel providing a training in Astronomy or Geology.

It may be said, Can you imagine Jesus Christ approving of war? As well might it be asked, Can you imagine a skilled physician "approving" of the external symptoms of some deeply-seated disease. But there is another reason why I cannot imagine Jesus Christ "approving of war." The reason is, not the suffering and death that war brings with it. The heart of the religion of the Cross is the will to give the uttermost. The reason is that I cannot imagine Jesus of set purpose laying down an abstract general principle in the manner of a mere moralist. This is never the purpose. The purpose is always to deal with the human soul which through those human eyes faces the Master now. It is with the individuality of every soul, each with its unique dangers, temptations, tasks, its life-problem which no other soul can solve, it is with these things that the original Gospel before all else is concerned. It is on the unique needs of this individual soul here and now that the spiritual energy of Jesus is concentrated. In the Gospel I find an individualism so penetrating and profound that it has embraced its opposite and become universalism. Hence general principles of the most far-reaching character may (rightly or wrongly) be derived from many Gospel incidents and sayings. But the set purpose always is to deal with the single soul. And I can imagine that for Jesus the central and all-important question would be, even in war, the inward disposition, the inward danger and duty, of each single soul taking part in it. I find it possible to imagine the Master saying, not to men in the mass but to those who one by one came to him for guidance: If you hear through the storm and fire the voice of the Ideal calling to you: if in the light of those higher instincts and deeper insights which make your better self, your whole soul demands that thus you shall give yourself; then I, Jesus the Christ, bid you go.

SERBIAN RELIEF FUND.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Permit me through your columns to thank the numerous Unitarian friends who have so generously responded to my two appeals on behalf of the suffering Serbians, and to state that the amount collected up to date is as follows:—

First Appeal, Feb. 23, 1915, Hospital Fund		£235	5 6
Second Appeal, Dec. 20, Hospital Fund	£38 11 10
Refugees Fund	138 2 2
Total		£411	19 6

This Fund will be closed on Monday, February 14, when I shall hand over my canvassing books to W. Graham, Esq., manager of the London City and Midland Bank, Ambleside, who has kindly undertaken to audit the same. As the needs of this suffering people are so great and urgent I shall be grateful for any further contributions to this Fund. The cost of collecting has been small considering the nature of the ground covered, viz., £10 3*s*. This I have much pleasure in bearing, so that the entire amount contributed goes direct to the sufferers.—Yours, &c.

'THE FREE CATHOLIC.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Can you find space for a few words on this topic from the point of view of one who was for twenty-five years an earnest Sacramentarian? During those years I was present at more than two thousand Eucharists, some in the quiet of early morning, when the seen and the unseen were as one; and others in crowded churches, when music and ceremonial stirred all the artistic, emotional, and devotional instincts of one's nature to their lowest depths. Looking back on such moments of exaltation, one has a feeling of something lacking in a mere "preaching service." The craving for some definite act of corporate worship demands a fuller expression than the singing of hymns (though I would most emphatically endorse every word of Mr. Cunliffe Fox's letter). But, though thus disposed to sympathy with this movement, I confess I do not see how it is possible along the lines indicated. All the warmth and all the glow of Catholic worship and symbolism spring from the belief in the "Real Presence" of Jesus in the Eucharist; and that, of course, implies belief in his Deity. To attempt to revive the symbol without the thing symbolised is, indeed, to play 'Hamlet' without the Prince! And to accept that is to revert to orthodoxy, with all its limitations and contradictions. (I admit that I have sometimes wondered if the altar and tabernacle might not be made the centre of a "picture-service" which would help to illustrate the idea of Divine Immanence for young or uneducated people.)

Dr. Moritz Weston rightly objects to the use of the word Catholic in a modern sense. But when he says that it has "a definite and inalienable connection with" the Pope and infallibility, he himself uses it in the most modern of all senses—a sense which was not de fide, even amongst Romanists, until 1870, and which is still denied by more than half of those who claim the title! In the strict technical meaning of the term, as denoting the whole body of doctrine and worship accepted by the "universal church" before the Great Schism, I doubt its fitness for the new movement. It is rather suggestive of Tooley Street! May I also, as for forty years a student of the hymnals of all denominations, say a hearty word of gratitude for our own book? I know of none to beat it. One hymn alone—'Father, Oh Hear Us, Seeking now to Praise Thee'—is worth reams of subjective gush. And there are others!—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The correspondence, recently published in your columns, with reference to the "Free Catholic" movement, voices opinions from the pulpit. I speak from the pews. The point at issue seems to be—Do the forms of service in use in our Unitarian Churches satisfy the needs of the people who attend them? I imagine that the Free Catholic movement is inspired by the conviction that they do not. I differ from you, sir, and from Dr. Moritz Weston, in thinking that the time is inopportune for the consideration of this subject. The Church ought to be the outward expression in the world of the spirit of Christ. Surely the condition of human affairs to-day is sufficient proof of the need for a close scrutiny of the condition of the Church. Forms of worship must feed the intellect, and this Unitarians have long recognised; they must also minister to the devotional nature, and in this respect, I think our Church is lacking. In the first number of The Free Catholic Mr. Whitaker has written on 'The Sacramental Church,' and I agree with him that the meaning and value of sacraments in the life of a Christian community is a subject of vital interest and importance, and one that demands sincere and earnest thought. The article to which I refer speaks of the danger of "barren individualism" and the disciplinary nature of the sacraments as a cure for this evil. "They come to us with an objective authority." As Christians, we profess to find our highest inspiration in spiritual companionship with Jesus Christ, and as in daily life we attach a social value to symbols as means of intercourse, so surely it is natural to use them in the family life of the Church. To me it is obvious that the most suitable and helpful symbol of our corporate communion with Christ should be the sacrament instituted by himself, and if it is, indeed, a help, might we not make more frequent use of it? I venture to add that if we wish to influence members of the Anglican or Roman communions, this problem must be dealt with, for to them the Eucharist is the greatest joy and privilege of Christian worship. Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—There are many men and women in our particular group of churches who will welcome the advent of The Free Catholic. I cannot agree with you in considering the publication of a new organ in our midst untimely. Surely at a time when our nation, by the glorious death of her worthiest sons on the battle-field, is learning the full meaning of Sacrifice, it is opportune that there should be writers who dare to show that we have not sufficiently strongly and fervently followed Christ, but have only been half-hearted, unenthusiastic in our loyalty to Him. The Free Catholic plainly stands for a definite and absolute loyalty to the Master. I hope it will not compromise in this respect. I doubt whether we can say this of many of the churches in the denomination. Our churches need a new awakening. They have become ineffective just because they have no definite message for the age; and this age is seeking for a church which shall be free from intricate creeds, and yet at the same time it yearns for a church where the atmosphere of Devotion, Beauty, Majesty, and Adoration can find expression, where men for a moment can commune with the Father and hear the call of Christ, "Follow me" in the silent solemnity of meditation. I take it that that is what the Free Catholics stand for. They are keen on converting the world to Christianity. It may be that there is within our churches some inner conviction; but it is so closely guarded that it is hidden from the world; the world sees it not and feels it not, and so is not influenced by it. The Free Catholic does stand for a definite inner conviction, but it is not afraid to express it. "There can be no peace save to those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Such an assertion moves man: many of us feel nothing intensely, and the result is we do nothing but become listless and act as centres of depression. Religion is a great adventure, a mighty launching out. I hope the glow of conviction which radiates from the pages of The Free Catholic may rouse up our churches and compel us to follow Christ with greater earnestness and passion.—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Dr. Moritz Weston's contribution in your last is interesting as coming from a former Catholic priest, but it only furnishes further evidence of the reaction which usually ensues when one passes from one extreme to the other. At such a stage the mind seems peculiarly incapable of just judgment as regards those things it has left behind. But this is not always the case. Might I refer Dr. Weston to Mr. Joseph McCabe's 'Church Discipline: an Ethical Study of the Church of Rome' (Duckworth, 3*s.*)? The writer, an ex-Roman Catholic monk, justly accounted a sworn enemy of that Church, whose out-and-out Rationalism of the Ernst Haeckel type is well known, reaches the conclusion, after having impartially considered the whole discipline of the Roman Church, that "It is manifest that the spiritual organisations of the future will find large inspiration in the Roman experience." "Its system represents the finished type of which the systems of other religions are rude and nebular adumbrations." "There is hardly a point of moral discipline in any other religion which has not been found for centuries in that greatest of the Christian bodies." He comes to this conclusion not only because he perceives a definite ethical value underlying every detail of the whole Roman discipline, but because he discovers also that all the influences and agencies used by that Church are far from being merely of its own growing, but are rooted in the universal experience of the race; that, e.g., Baptism, Confirmation, Communion, and, indeed, the whole ritual, ceremonial and sacramental system of the Church of Rome arise from primal instincts of human nature, and have found expression in nearly all the religions and among nearly all the peoples of historic time. If an extreme Rationalist and enemy of the Church of Rome can still find ethical values in that Church, is it not conceivable that we might possibly find some too? As to the use of the word "Catholic," may I point out that it was quite a favourite word on the lips of the Presbyterians from whom many of our congregations have sprung.—Yours, &c. H. H. JOHNSON.

"OUR BEAUTIFUL HYMNS."

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The point is that "the beauty and elevation of our hymnals," so much "admired" by visitors, are not the first things to be looked for in hymnals. Too often it has to be said of such visitors that "in that book they read no farther." Their "admiration" does not make for church membership or devout worship. Imagine a soul crushed by the 'Dies Iræ,' or melted by 'Rock of Ages,' or lifted up by 'O Love that wilt not let me go,' murmuring appreciatively "How beautiful! A real poem!" I quite heartily agree that orthodox hymn-books are often disfigured by rank masses of doggerel consisting of rhymed theological exposition. But even hymns too weighted with doctrine can be helpful if they call forth warm feeling, and almost anything is better than the abstractness and disembodied ethicism which pads out our own books with minor poetry. No Free Catholic will consent to believe that we are shut up to a choice between these two extremes—harsh dogma on the one hand, and on the other a bland and mellifluous religiosity.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE MINISTRY OF BOOKS.

ENGLISH POETS AND THE NATIONAL IDEAL. Four Lectures by E. de Sélincourt. Oxford, at the University Press. 2*s.* 6*d.* net.

POETS AND PURITANS. By T. R. Glover. London: Methuen & Co. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

THESE two books to a certain extent cover the same ground. Milton and Wordsworth have a prominent place in both of them. But we have placed them together on account of a certain contrast in their method of treatment, and because this contrast illustrates the twofold ministry of books to a mind in need of light and of spacious thought. Mr. de Sélincourt uses his poets to illuminate the tragic struggle of the moment, to kindle the fire of sympathy, and to urge the deathless claims of freedom. It is right that he should do so. We find in him an expert guide in a task which all of us, who have ever cared for great poetry in the past, have been trying to do almost instinctively for ourselves. There is many a familiar passage in the Bible, in Shakespeare, in Milton or Wordsworth, which has only now become vital to us, because for the first time it is charged with the passion of our own experience. And we in our turn derive from them some balance of mind, some largeness of view, some of the confidence of faith, which combatants who never slake their thirst at these fountains of living water so quickly lose in the dust and heat of the struggle. It is then as a prophetic interpreter that Mr. de Sélincourt appeals to us, and it is the prophetic note which rings full and clear when he is in intimate accord with his subject. When he lapses into the more ordinary mood of the literary critic he is less successful. Why, for instance, should he waste precious time in rather petulant criticism of Tennyson, who was at least a consummate artist and has other sources of joy for us, even if he was not one of the elect champions of liberty? It is not the only function of our poets to preach to us, though some of the greatest of them have done that magnificently. Wordsworth, as Mr. de Sélincourt points out, entered the political arena as a pamphleteer, and in the sonorous prose and the moral elevation of his 'Convention of Cintra' was almost the rival of Burke. That others did not follow his example is no ground of complaint, though, for any direct service which they may render to us in the present crisis, they must simply be left on one side.

Mr. Glover's method appeals to another mood. He has turned to his old favourites more to seek distraction than to learn a lesson, and he brings us the cheerful news that his books have not failed him in their ministry of friendship and consolation. They are a pleasant company who saunter through his pages, all the more so because they are familiar. Spenser, Milton, Evelyn, Bunyan, Cowper, Boswell, Crabbe, Wordsworth, Carlyle—we could all suggest additions to the list or substitute other names with perhaps higher claims to immortality; but Mr. Glover is the master of the feast, and this is his selection. We must relax the mind sometimes even in the midst of the severest tasks, and we could not do it in better or more refreshing society. These are not the essays of a critic, cautious in praise and sensitive to every blemish of thought or style. They are full of the spirit of happy acceptance, which says—"These men lived and wrote books that have not been forgotten. Let us live a little while in their company, and be richer and happier men for the experience." This is the tolerance of the true bibliophile, the friend of books, who has but to open their pages in order to people his room with the best company in the world. We can only thank Mr. Glover for his "record of personal acquaintances and of enjoyment," coming as it does at a time when we serve the need of the hour best by allowing ourselves now and then an hour's respite from its strain. And surely it is no accident that passages continually leap to the eye in which we find a reflection of what is deepest in the moral purpose of our own lives.

"The phrase 'Tis against that that we are fighting,' spoken simply and with feeling by his friend, with the sight before them, lodged itself in Wordsworth's mind. The words and the sight together brought home to him the meaning of the Revolution, and he entered into its spirit as he had not before. It was one of those permanent experiences, which haunt a man for ever, fresh and clear in every detail, and never lose their moving power."

These words may have been written without any conscious reference to the present war; but they express with startling exactness of language the vision of cruelty and outrage which has changed a struggle for freedom into a crusade against intolerable wrong. But we did not intend to leave this cheerful and companionable book on this note of conflict. Let us return with the author to the pleasant diary of John Evelyn, of whom Abraham Cowley sang:

In Books and Gardens thou hast plac'd aright (Things which thou well dost understand
And both dost make with thy industrious hand)
Thy noble innocent delight,
And in thy virtuous Wife, where thou again dost meet
Both pleasures more refin'd and sweet:
The fairest gardens in her looks
And in her mind the wisest books.

The new number of the Social Service Quarterly contains an account, by the Rev. H. H. Johnson, of the lectures given at the Inter-Denominational Summer School held at Swanwick last summer, now published in a handy volume entitled 'International Relationships in the Light of Christianity.' We have dealt with the proceedings of the Summer School in previous issues; but no mere summary could do justice to the discussions which were led by such men as Mr. Clutton Brock, Dr. Wicksteed, Canon Masterman, Father Plater, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and Principal Graham, and we would suggest that those who are interested in the vital problems raised by these able speakers—and who is not?—should procure this little volume, which is published by The Collegium, 92 St. George's Square, S.W., price 2*s.* 6*d.*, without delay. Attention is also drawn in the Quarterly to an extremely useful Year Book, published by the Federal Council Commission on the Church and Social Service in America, which is a veritable mine of information on Social Service Organisations in the United States. It is interesting to note that, while organisation interdenominationally is further advanced in America than with us, owing largely, perhaps, to the fact that we co-operate with Roman Catholics as well as with Protestants, our movement is wider in its scope and really seems to be making for a more universal type of liberal thought. Miss Harriet M. Johnson deals with the Tsar's startling temperance mandate in an article on 'The New Russia' which ends on a most optimistic note. The Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., Hon. Treasurer, has been appointed the Union's representative on the National Conference Committee for the next three years.

THE BICENTENARY OF DR. DANIEL WILLIAMS.

On Thursday afternoon, January 27, a commemorative visit was made by the Dr. Williams' Trustees to the tomb of their founder, which stands in the eastern portion of the famous Nonconformist burial ground, Bunhill Fields. The day was dark and cloudy, and the air damp ; but rain held off, and the proceedings, brief but impressive, were duly carried out. Those present included (in order of seniority on the Trust), the Rev. Dr. P. H. Wicksteed, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Dr. Talfourd Ely, the Rev. W. Wooding, Mr. G. W. Brown, the Rev. H. Gow, Mr. E. A. Wurtzburg, Mr. A. A. Tayler, Mr. Ion Pritchard ; the officers—the Rev. R. Travers Herford (Secretary and librarian), Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke (surveyor), Mr. P. Roscoe (solicitor), and the Rev. F. H. Jones (ex-Secretary and librarian).

Dr. Wicksteed, Senior Trustee, standing at the edge of the tomb, disclaimed all intention of a formal memorial address, but wished to express in a few words the gratitude and respect in which the memory of the Rev. Dr. Daniel Williams was held by many hundreds of students and other beneficiaries, and the desire of his Trustees to reconsecrate themselves to the work so wisely and beneficially planned two hundred years ago. Dr. Williams died January 26, 1716. Under happier national circumstances the Trustees would have endeavoured to celebrate the bicentenary of his death in some public manner ; but as things were it seemed more appropriate that they should simply gather at the founder's tomb and render the due offices of piety and reverence to his memory without any formal commemoration. Their visit derived added interest from the fact that, on the occasion of the centenary in 1816, a similar pilgrimage had been made to that spot by their predecessors on the Trust. There was, to his mind, something deeply impressive and significant in the fact that, after the lapse of so long a period as two centuries since the founder passed away, they still saw his benevolent purposes effectually at work, and still following the main lines he intended them to take. It was a sincere satisfaction to his Trustees to feel that, in spite of all the changes time had brought, and the necessity of freely modifying so many details of the administration of his Trust, they could feel the utmost confidence that they were not only doing work that approved itself to their own judgment, but were acting in full accord with the aims and spirit of their founder's will. This testified eloquently to the breadth and sagacity of mind which characterised him. Dr. Williams was a man of marked influence and character, though he would not be hailed as a man of outstanding genius, and if he attained no permanent celebrity as a scholar, all his interests, and especially the character of his library, proved that, in addition to his philanthropic care for the poor and ignorant, and his solicitude and sympathy for his brother ministers whose means were scanty, he was a man of wide intellectual outlook, and fully realised the importance of a high standard of scholarly efficiency among those who were to lead and sustain the religious life of the people. The library, as those present well knew, had developed a far-spreading influence which could not have been anticipated by Dr. Williams himself. Its range of contents had greatly widened, and its readers had multiplied. It had truly become an invaluable help to those who sought learning in all its more serious and fruitful forms ; and the character of the original collection left by the founder had fully justified his Trustees in opening the shelves of the library to all the newer developments of philosophy, sociology, history, art, and science which must take a more and more prominent place in the studies of the minister of religion. And more than this, in these days, when obviously the promotion of the religious life was not the exclusive charge of any one group of churches, or of all churches together, they felt that they were properly carrying out the founder's intentions when they tried to be serviceable to all serious students, whether theology did or did not form their central interest, and when they gave a liberal interpretation to such a phrase as "Bibles and other good practical books for the poor," and endeavoured to make their gifts the means of opening an outlook into the world of imagination and idealism, or unsealing the sources of intellectual guidance and inspiration to such as needed suggestion and support. In the exercise of their best judgment in these and other ways, the Trustees enjoyed the feeling that the spirit which so wisely began this good and useful work two centuries ago was still a living force with them, and they rejoiced in the conviction that, having stood so well the test of so long an experience, the broad-minded and benevolent principles embodied by Dr. Williams in his generous bequest were destined to be no less beneficial in the future than they had been in the past. It was, therefore, with hearty admiration and sincere reverence towards him that they had thus assembled that day to honour "the pious memory of the Founder." If it were found possible, after the desolating struggle at present absorbing every mind, to do more to mark appropriately this historic event, they might more adequately express their feelings. Let it for the present suffice that, with a deeper realisation of their duties and opportunities, the Trustees dedicate their efforts anew to the best fulfilment of their Founder's desires. And surely it was an impressive and sustaining thought to reflect that during all the upheavals and wrenchings of the war the quiet work of the Trust had been unbroken and almost undisturbed. By the will of the Founder, who died two hundred years ago, widows and broken-down ministers had been helped, preachers had been heartened in their work, students had been encouraged and assisted, and those interests had been sustained and asserted which were there before the war, and would be there after it, and on the purity and fervour of which, in the last resort, so much of the value of life must depend—of that life which our brothers were fighting to defend.

At the close of the address the visitors spent a little time inspecting some of the more notable graves in this historic, but too little known, burial ground; among them were those of Isaac Watts (close to Dr. Williams'), Defoe, Bunyan, and the Cromwells. Special interest attached to the graves of the grandfather of the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and of Theophilus Lindsay, with whose dust mingles that of his admirer and successor, Thomas Belsham. A glimpse of the spot where lies William Blake, unmarked by any stone; a look across into Bunhill Row, where stood John Milton's deathplace, 1674, and then the Trustees hurried away to their Quarterly Meeting at the Library, Gordon Square.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Chester.—By the restoration of the organ in Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, the members of that ancient place of worship now possess a fitting memorial of the late Miss M. K. Montgomery, B.A., the devoted daughter of a former minister of the church, and a strenuous worker for many years in connection with its organisations. The organ, which has two manuals and pedals, has been reconstructed by the well-known firm of Messrs. Charles Whiteley & Co., Chester, and its fine qualities were revealed on Wednesday evening, January 26, on the occasion of its re-opening, when a recital was given by Mr. J. E. Wallace, Mus.Bac., F.R.C.O., of Ullet Road Church, Liverpool, and a memorial brass was unveiled by Miss E. K. McConnell, of Liverpool, an old friend of the late Miss Montgomery. The inscription on the memorial brass is as follows: "To the glory of God. This organ was restored by members and friends in remembrance of Mary Katharine Montgomery, B.A., born 28th Nov., 1868, died 24th Nov., 1914. A life-long worshipper in this chapel, of which she was a benefactor and trustee, and an earnest worker in the Sunday school. 26th January, 1916." The memorial was dedicated at a special service, which was attended by a large congregation. Mr. F. H. Illingworth presided, and the service was conducted by the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans. The following message was received from Mr. Mortimer Montgomery, K.C., who was unable to be present: "Please give my greetings to my friends at the old chapel, where I made so many friends, and of which I have so many happy memories."

Leeds.—The first annual meeting of the Mill Hill Sewing League was held at Lyndhurst, North Grange Road, Headingley, on Saturday, January 29, by the kind invitation of Mrs. Oliver Lupton. The President, Mrs. F. W. Kitson, took the chair at 3.30 P.M. The Hon. Secretary, Mrs. Dand, in presenting the report, explained how the league came into being in September, 1914, when the minister, the Rev. R. N. Cross, called together the Unitarian women of Leeds for the purpose of discussing war work. Combining the Women's League, the Sewing Society, the Girls' Club and members of the congregations of the three churches in Leeds—Hunslet, Holbeck and Mill Hill—the league has completed 2,810 garments, 1,150 being hand-knitted articles. Many institutions have benefited, including the Belgian Hospital Fund, two hospital units in Serbia, a French Riviera Hospital, Dr. Barnardo's Homes and the Leeds Babies Welcomes; also various local regiments through the Leeds Lady Mayoress's Committee, and members of the school and congregation serving with His Majesty's forces. Mrs. Chas. Boyle, in presenting the Treasurer's statements, showed how £134 had been spent from September, 1914, to December, 1915. The President moved the adoption of the Report and Balance Sheet, and in seconding, Miss L. M. Passavant described the work done by the Mill Hill Girls' Club, who had contributed 231 garments out of the total. Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot explained the Lord Mayor's scheme of co-operation of working parties, and Dr. King May-Atkinson, resident house surgeon of St. Mary's Hospital, Manchester, who was for nine months a surgeon in the Stobart Hospital Unit in Kragurevatz, Serbia, gave an interesting account of the work of this unit. Arriving in Serbia at the end of April, when the Scottish Women's Hospital Unit and others had got a grip of the typhus and consequently greatly improved the conditions, the Stobart Unit went under canvas on the old race-course above Kragurevatz as a surgical unit, to move forward with the army. Under healthier conditions rapid improvements among the wounded soldiers were effected, and a tent was given up for civilians, and six dispensaries for civilians were started in outlying districts. Dr. May-Atkinson had to return to England in October, owing to ill-health, but described the experiences of the unit as told by her sister, Dr. Mabel May, who was in charge of the unit during the forced march through the mountains of Albania to the sea. Owing to the rapid advance of the Austrians the unit were obliged to evacuate towards the end of October. Both these ladies have had bestowed upon them, by the Serbian authorities, the order of St. Sava, for devoted service. Speaking also of Dr. Berry's Unit in the highest terms of praise, Dr. May-Atkinson described how through the energies of this splendid organiser, the town where one of the six hospitals was stationed was, by reorganisation of sanitary conditions, turned from a hotbed of disease into quite a health resort. Mr. Kramatch, the Serbian Consul in Bradford, then spoke of the great needs of Serbia and of the Serbian Hospital Fund. Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot moved, and Miss Buckley seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the speakers. Tea was provided by Mrs. Oliver Lupton and Mrs. Grosvenor Talbot and the proceeds (£1 8*s.*) were handed over to the society.

Liscard.—On Thursday evening, January 13, in the Church Hall, the members of the Memorial Church to the number of 130 assembled in response to the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. Coventry. As Chairman of the church Mr. Coventry gave a hearty welcome to all present, and spoke of the good work of their various institutions, paying a special tribute to the valuable services of the Choir. The minister, the Rev. A. E. Parry, said he was glad these annual socials were being revived, as he thought they were beneficial in strengthening good fellowship among the congregation. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers of Liverpool spoke on the comprehensiveness of Christianity and religion. He looked forward, he said, to the time when the barrier of sectarianism would be broken down amongst all denominations and creeds. An excellent musical programme was rendered by the Choir.

London: Islington.—The Rev. J. Vint Laughland, who has been in charge of Unity Church for three months, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become the minister.

The Midland Sunday School Association.—The annual meetings of this association were held at the Old Meeting Church Schools, Birmingham, on Saturday, January 29, the attendance being exceptionally good. At the annual meeting in the afternoon very satisfactory reports were read by the Secretary and the Treasurer. The financial statement shows an income for the year much in excess of the normal expenditure. The adverse balance of £6 19*s.* 2*d.* represents an exceptional deficit which was £14 1*s.* 9*d.* at the commencement of the year. The schools in the Association had been asked to double their minimum subscriptions for this year, and more than half had generously responded to the call. The number of schools now in the Association is sixteen, this being an increase of one. The Visitation Reports were summarised by the President, the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, as also the reports sent in from unvisited schools. Despite unusual conditions due to the war much had been done, and most schools appear to have made progress. A large number of senior scholars and male teachers had joined the army, and this had in a few cases brought forward volunteers from the congregations to act as teachers. The President then gave a short address, and this was followed by an address from the delegate from the Sunday School Association, Miss Clephan. Her words of reminiscence and counsel for young teachers were timely and valuable. The delegate from the North Midland Sunday School Association, the Rev. H. H. C. Jones, was unable to attend owing to illness. After tea a Conference was held, presided over by the President. The subject, 'The Value of Great Pictures for Purposes of Religious Instruction,' was introduced by the Rev. L. Clare, of the Church of the Messiah. In an able address Mr. Clare outlined the difference between a truly great picture, great in its expression of an ideal, of religious truth, and the picture that was merely a fine piece of technical skill, but without a soul. The speaker, in concluding, gave four or five pictures as examples of his meaning. Several of those present joined in the discussion and asked questions upon several matters, to which the speaker replied. The President then announced the result of the voting by ballot for new officers, the following being elected: President for 1916, Mr. W. Cheshire; Vice-Presidents, the Rev. H. Warnock and Mr. E. Ellis Townley; Secretary, Mr. Lewis Lloyd; Treasurer, the Rev. T. Graham. Resolutions of thanks to the retiring officers, the conference speaker, and the minister and officers of the Old Meeting for the use of their premises were carried unanimously, and the Doxology and Benediction closed an entirely successful series of meetings.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The Quarterly Meetings of the above Society were held at Nottage, South Wales, on Monday, January 31, when delegates were present from most of the affiliated churches. Portions of the morning and afternoon were devoted to transacting the business of the Society. At 4.30 a public conference was held in the chapel when Mrs. John Lewis, Pontypridd, gave a very interesting and suggestive paper dealing with the work of the British League of Unitarian Women. A useful discussion followed the paper, in which Mrs. Fox of Cardiff, Mrs. Sidney Lewis and others took part, and it is hoped, as a result of the conference, that branches of the League will be formed in at least some of the churches affiliated with the Society which hitherto have not had any. The ministers and delegates were entertained to tea at the close of the conference by the lady members of the Nottage Church. A public meeting was held in the evening. Unfortunately, owing to there being no late trains, most of the visiting friends were obliged to leave before the meeting began, but there was an excellent attendance of local friends. The meeting opened with a brief devotional service, which was conducted by the Rev. D. Cellan Evans of Merthyr. The chair was taken by the Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., Swansea (President of the Society). Especial interest attached to the address and presence of Mr. Jones, as this was probably one of his last public utterances prior to his leaving to take up Red Cross work at the front, his church having generously granted him three months leave of absence for that purpose. His opening address from the chair was stirring and deeply impressive. The subject of the addresses was 'Our Duty to Our Churches in Time of War,' and the speakers, the Revs. T. Eric Davis and D. G. Rees. Both addresses were brimful of wise suggestion, and should serve to stimulate all who heard them to greater earnestness and fidelity in the things of the deeper life. The Rev. W. J. Phillips having spoken a few words, in which he expressed the pleasure it had given the Nottage friends to welcome the Society's delegates and other visitors, the meeting closed with the singing of a hymn and the pronouncing of the benediction.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE COMMONS AND FOOTPATHS PRESERVATION SOCIETY.

The Government owes much to the Commons and Footpaths Preservation Society for the facilities for the training of troops which the open spaces under its protection have afforded, but it is not on that account alone that we regret the fact that the war has prevented any celebration of its jubilee. For fifty years the Society has fought for the rights of the people against public authorities and private interests, which have continually threatened to enclose the waste lands and commons where so many thousands are free to seek recreation and health to-day. Lord Eversley, one of the original founders, has rendered invaluable service in this cause, and perhaps the most dramatic incident in the Society's history occurred when, acting on his advice, an army of men were sent down from London in the night to remove the iron fence which the late Lord Brownlow had erected round six hundred acres of Berkhamsted Common to add to his park. The Society has fought many a hard fight, and still needs to be both vigilant and active, for illegal enclosures are constantly taking place, and undesirable schemes of afforestation require to be watched. As Mr. Lawrence Chubb, the Secretary, has pointed out, "our commons are natural reserves which it would be folly to sacrifice upon the altar of utilitarianism while millions of acres of enclosed land lie idle in a productive sense."

HUMANITARIAN AND RELIGIOUS ORGANISATIONS.

Co-operation and co-ordination are our watchwords to-day, and it is entirely in keeping with the desire for union in common efforts for the welfare of the nation that a conference of humanitarian and religious organisations has been summoned for next week, with a view to concerted action for the more effective realisation of common aims. A circular has been issued signed by a number of prominent men and women, including Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., Canon Scott Holland, Dr. L. P. Jacks, Lady Emily Lutyens, Miss Lind-af-Hageby, Mr. Carl Heath, Bishop Welldon, Dr. Clifford, and Sir Francis Younghusband, which sets forth as follows the objects of this new effort :—

1. To collate and publish helpful information (e.g., in pamphlet form and through a year-book) concerning the principles, organisation, and activities of humanitarian and religious movements.

2. To facilitate co-operation, official and unofficial, to such a degree as may recommend itself to each movement (e.g., exchange of reports, literature, and speakers, notification of conferences, federation, and, in exceptional cases, amalgamation).

3. To promote friendly personal intercourse between the workers in the various movements.

4. To found centres, national and international, for the furtherance of the above objects, which may in time develop into clearing-houses of information and meeting places for concerted activities.

5. To facilitate the provision of the machinery necessary for organising conferences of groups of movements, or of the movements as a whole, for the consideration of group or common problems.

THE PROGRESS OF THE NEGRO.

The American negroes are developing very rapidly, and from being a body of people who would always, in the view of some members of Congress, have to be merely "fed, clothed and sheltered," they have become an important and prosperous section of the community, a real asset to the State. The Christian Register recently gave some account of the sixteenth convention of the National Negro Business League in Boston at which some seven hundred delegates from thirty different States were present, and it is extremely interesting to read of the progress which has been made since Dr. Booker Washington, and a few like-minded coloured men, first started this association. That the negro should do nothing more than emulate his white brethren in the mere pursuit of the almighty dollar is the last thing we should desire, but it must be recognised, of course, that without education, and the possibility of acquiring some standing through improved economic conditions and the opportunity of profiting by their own natural abilities, the coloured men for whom emancipation from slavery was the first step upwards would have had little chance of making any headway at all. To-day, after fifty years of freedom, it is possible for them to look forward to a future worthy of the industry and idealism which have made America rather acutely aware of their existence during the last decade or two, and to hope that they will be able to overcome the race antagonisms which have taken such an ugly shape in lynchings and certain arbitrary forms of taboo.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THERE have been rumours in the Press this week that Germany has offered separate terms of peace to Belgium on the basis of a complete evacuation of the country. Though the story comes from Rome it is not in itself improbable, and the announcement that an official repudiation by the Vatican of the share which it is alleged to have taken in the secret negotiations will appear shortly in no way discredits it. These devices of defeated diplomacy are quite in accordance with the rules of the game. In any case, if the terms were offered they have been rejected with scorn, and the ties existing between Belgium and the other Allies have been strengthened by the refusal.

WE are, of course, quite right to take it for granted that German intrigue and the bait of terms, which on the surface are not unattractive, are powerless against the splendid loyalty of King Albert and his people to the cause of freedom and national independence. But let us remember what this loyalty is costing them. The longing to get back to their own homes and to escape from this nightmare of exile and torture must be overwhelming. It is hard to maintain courage and hope and the willing acceptance of suffering for a noble cause through the sordid monotony of this war. There must be some among them who grow faint-hearted and wonder whether it is worth while, after they have lost all, to struggle and suffer any longer. But Belgium is prepared to go on paying the bitter price of her faithfulness. She is still sustained by an invincible idealism. The temporary triumph of brute force cannot make her yield. It is a spectacle which in its moral splendour makes it easier for the whole world to believe in God and the spiritual claims of justice and freedom.

IT is this deep admiration for loyalty and heroism, mingled with undying gratitude for what Belgium did in the early days of the war, which inspires every effort we make on her behalf. To help her is not so much a duty as a privilege. Our utmost generosity will never do more than make her burden a little less intolerable. We have done our best to make our own work on behalf of her wounded soldiers express something of the friendship which we owe to her. Every fresh proof which she gives of her courage and loyalty only deepens our obligation to strengthen and uphold her, and we must go on doing it without any slackening of effort until she is restored to her own land, with all her rights vindicated, and bearing in her hands the fruits of an honourable peace.

THE accounts which have been published of the systematic starvation of the Russian Poles are terrible, and there will be nothing but the most eager desire on our part to answer the agonizing appeal for help which has come to us from various Polish Committees via America. But the problem is not at all a simple one for our own Government. To do anything which would make it easier for Germany and Austria to plunder and despoil the territories which they have over-run is impossible, unless we are prepared to accept the risk of prolonging the war and increasing the enemy's power of resistance just at a time when there are indications that it has been seriously undermined. No responsible statesman could endorse such a policy. The alternative is, we know, appalling, but in present circumstances we must accept it as the less of two evils. In other words, without the co-operation of the Central Powers and an undertaking by them that they will cease to plunder, we cannot allow supplies to be imported which will really be for their use.

IT is in these terms that Sir Edward Grey has replied to the urgent representations which have been made to him by Mr. Hoover on the matter. Mr. Hoover, it will be remembered, is the able controller of American Relief work in Belgium.

> In face of the accumulating evidence of German and Austrian requisitions in Poland [he writes]....I fear it would be impossible to enter into any arrangement with you in regard to any scheme of relief until the German and Austrian Governments have prohibited the export of all foodstuffs from Russian Poland, and have guaranteed that native stocks of foodstuffs shall not be drawn upon to maintain the occupying armies. If and when this were done, it might be possible to come to an arrangement with you for allowing the importation of certain articles into Poland in return for undertakings on the part of the German and Austrian Governments to supply an adequate ration of other necessary articles, and to give you a free hand in the distribution of all stocks of foodstuffs thus made available. But the prohibition of export and the guarantee mentioned above must be regarded as conditions precedent to any further discussion, since these measures are demanded by the situation now existing, quite independently of the question of imports, and the fact that they have not yet been put into force constitutes evidence that the German and Austrian Governments will never co-operate in any work undertaken in the interests of the population of Poland.

The question of reprisals for Zeppelin Raids has produced a vigorous correspondence in The Times. Lord Rosebery has written strongly in favour of vigorous action. "There may be difficulties," he says, "from the air-craft point of view in reprisals. I am not behind the scenes, and I do not know. But as regards policy there can be none. We have too long displayed a passive and excessive patience." This statement has called forth replies from the veteran Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood and Canon Sanday. The former expresses the hope that our fighting Services will never adopt a policy of warfare against non-combatants, and quotes the saying of Marshal Marmont, "Les représailles sont toujours inutiles." He also supports the view that the German intention is not to kill non-combatants but to do serious military damage.

Canon Sanday points out that the country had better make up its mind once for all to have nothing to do with reprisals. "Deliberate reason and the experience of the past alike condemn them. At such a game we are sure to be beaten, just because the enemy is more unscrupulous than we are." He expresses his complete disbelief in the strange kind of homœopathy which supposes that we should check atrocities by adding to them. "The only result," he maintains, "would be to drive up the standard of ruthlessness in war, and that is high enough already. Let the enemy fill up his cup to the brim. It is not in vain that the whole world is looking on. When the time comes for the great Convention of the nations at the end of the war let us at least go into it with clean hands"

On the other hand there is a striking article by Prof. J. H. Morgan, who takes a precisely opposite point of view. He believes that the effect of air reprisals on the civil population of Germany would be salutary, and for that reason they are justified.

> I say this [he writes] in no spirit of indiscriminate vindictiveness or blind hatred—hatred, as a great Frenchman has said, 'c'est la colère des faibles'—but because I believe that these Zeppelin raids are largely, if not principally, designed to gratify the civil population of Germany with otiose sensations not only of military prowess but of sanguinary delight. No one can doubt this who reads the carefully inspired articles in the German newspapers. They betray a ghoulish satisfaction in the feeling that the war is being carried into every village and every home (I quote almost the very words of the Neue Freie Presse.) The only way to deal with this is to convince the civil population of Germany that their lust for slaughter will recoil on their own infatuated heads

We believe that Prof. Morgan is probably right in the picture he draws of the mentality of the civil population in Germany. In face of the evidence it seems to us quite impossible to regard it as innocent in these matters. Prussian militarism and the German people are not in sharp moral opposition, as many of us were anxious to believe in the early days of the war. But even so we cannot accept his argument, though we admit that it has nothing in common with the vulgar cry, "A bomb for a bomb," which disfigured one of the placards in the London streets this week. Our air-raids must have a definite military objective, and in the end it is not sporadic horrors but the steady advance of our military power which will chasten the blatant jingoism of the German civilian.

Arrangements are being made by the Church of England for a "National Mission of Repentance and Hope," to be held in the autumn. In a letter which has been addressed by the two Archbishops to the diocesan bishops of England and Wales, and sent to the Press, there is no clear indication of the purpose of the Mission beyond a statement that its appeal is to be "in connection with the religious lessons and opportunities of the war." We are accordingly left in doubt whether the idea is due to the official religious mind, which feels that it ought to be doing something suitable, or springs from an urgent spiritual demand. If it had been the latter we doubt whether the Archbishops would have closed their letter with the forlorn announcement: "We have good reason to hope that the leaders of other religious communions in England will make arrangements in their own way for an independent effort kindred to our own." Apparently the old wine-skins are all ready to receive the new wine, and are quite oblivious of the possible consequences. Perhaps some humble Christians will remember a certain parable which records how the wine was spilled and the skins perished, and will ask themselves whether it has any meaning for the clerical mind as it faces the tremendous upheaval of these days.

In an address which he delivered in Manchester last week, Mr. Harold Cox pointed out how the new moral forces which have been generated by the war may react beneficially upon the whole economic life of the country, and particularly in curbing the spirit of class warfare and softening the antagonism between the wage-earner and his employer. The following passage is all the more impressive as coming from an economist who is clearer than most men of any suspicion of Socialism.

> The conception that the wage-earner ought not to be at war with his employer came primarily from the German Socialists. But it was very easy to blame the Socialists. There must be some blame on both sides. The employer's attitude was often wrong. He set his face against increase of wages as a fixed principle. To see an instance of this wrong attitude of mind we had only to notice the horror expressed by many people in the well-to-do classes when they heard that working people were buying pianos. Why, in the name of wonder, should not the working man buy a piano? The feeling that he ought not was simply a survival of the old tradition, which went back to the days of slavery and serfdom, that the man who worked with his hands belonged to an inferior grade of humanity, and must always belong to it.

Mr. Cox went on to point out that once good feeling was engendered it would be seen how absurd it was for the employer to keep down wages and for the workmen to restrict output. "The higher the workman's standard of life, the greater his demand for goods; the greater the output of work the greater the means out of which wages can be paid."

There are special reasons why we should remember the centenary of F. W. Robertson—he was born on February 3, 1816—with special gratitude at the present time. He is usually reckoned among the pioneers of liberalism in the Church of England; but the universal elements in his teaching were due not so much to any rationalistic strain in his theology as to the piercing insight of his conscience. He had a clear and high sense of duty and of the value of the disciplined life—"as ever in my great Taskmaster's eye"—and his moral judgment was entirely free from sentimentalism and the devotion to personal fads which tempt men to set up their own opinions against the eternal claims of righteousness. He lived before fashionable "isms" had learned to masquerade as the voice of God in defiance of the plainest facts of moral experience and the insistent demands of personal duty. For some of us the memory of many of his sermons, read in the first enthusiasm of opening manhood, remains as something clean, strong, and inspiring. How well he could read our hearts. How stern he was to our sins. How bracing to our sloth and self-indulgence his picture of the obedience and chivalrous devotion of the good soldier of Jesus Christ.

SOME REFLECTIONS AND A MORAL.

We print to-day two contributions to the discussion on 'Free Catholicism,' which has been running its course in our columns during the last few weeks, to which we desire to call special attention. One from the pen of Miss Dorothea Hollins will be read by many of our readers with sincere pleasure. It is a just and beautiful tribute to her religious ancestry and the strong stock of broad-minded and noble-hearted men and women from which many of us have sprung. It is taken for granted too readily by many people, who base their judgments more on popular prejudices than on knowledge of the facts, that the Unitarian movement in the past has been dry, cold, and rationalistic. We are told sometimes that it has contributed something to intellectual enlightenment, but has cared little for the souls of men. Our own impression is that, while it has had a moderate and healthy influence upon the growth of theology, it is the dignity and richness of its special type of Christian character which is most worthy to be held in lasting remembrance. The homes it created, in their simplicity and quiet faithfulness to principle among the most religious in the land, the breadth of its sympathies, its noble tradition of public benevolence—these things are the language of a faith which may have been restrained in language and ritual, but certainly was not lacking in inward fire.

Possibly Mr. Lloyd Thomas, a letter from whom we also publish to-day, hardly realises how much he owes to this broad-minded religious tradition, which is his not by birth and all the gracious memories of early training, but by later conviction. The attitude of mind which he describes is one with which we are perfectly familiar, when allowance has been made for little differences of phrase and personal attitude. The sectarianism, which he condemns, may no doubt have found some lodgment among us owing to the weakness of human nature, but it is not one of our chief characteristics, and is, indeed, deeply inconsistent with our best life. We have never contended that our way is the only way, or lost our vision of the church universal. Nor has it ever been our practice to turn away with obstinate dislike from any new manifestation of the Spirit. Temperamentally, no doubt, we dislike being hurried into new points of view; but this does not necessarily mean that we have a double-dose of obstinacy in our constitution, but only that we are little prone to the instability of character and flightiness of mind, which have often resulted in disaster for new religious movements.

Of one thing we are quite certain that we may assure Mr. Lloyd Thomas, namely that neither the readers of The Inquirer nor his fellow-ministers are going to assume an attitude of "supercilious superiority" towards him and his propaganda. That is not our way. At least our experience of them is this, that they are not very intractable when they are approached in a spirit of confidence and friendship. In any case we may go so far as to suggest that it will be time enough to use language implying coldness or ostracism in five or six years' time, if the course of events should unhappily show that we have been sorely lacking in Christian tolerance and charity or wilfully blind to the shining of a great light. Meanwhile, it is for those who feel that we ought to attach ourselves to their movement, to accept their leadership, and to wear their label, to win us by the loftiness of the truth which they have to proclaim, to gladden our longing eyes with a new vision of the tenderness and compassion of God, and to melt our obstinacy by their kindness and goodwill. May we with all respect recommend to their notice the following wise saying by the late Bishop Creighton: "The more a man is sure of his own position, the less will he wish to force it upon others, and the more he will trust to the inherent power of truth."

So much circumstances have made it necessary for us to say, though we have said it with difficulty and reluctance. At the present moment all controversy about religion, which tends to emphasise differences and to range friends and brothers in opposing camps, seems to us unseasonable. It may limit so easily the free play of our sympathies and make us slow to understand the deeper meaning of what is happening around us. For ourselves we have proclaimed "a fast from strife." We cannot summon our energies to the old tasks of debate. Many things about which good men have differed in church government or theological definition seem to us now as the small dust of the balance. This does not spring from weariness and overstrain, though it is true that our hearts are full to overflowing with sorrow and anxiety, and all our strength must be given to national duties and the works of mercy, which the suffering of the war has laid upon us. Deeper than all this there is for the religious mind a sense that God is dealing with us in terrible ways. It is not only fruitful fields and fair cities which are being laid waste. The whole spiritual life of man is being tested in the fire. We cannot tell in what form it will emerge. But it seems to us unlikely that the new faith will find everything that it needs in the habits and symbols which have long been dear to our own hearts. We may be on the brink of a more decisive break with the whole mediæval tradition in religion than it is easy for any of us to imagine. It is possible that sacrifice and heroism and the kindling power of love and goodness, which men are discovering for themselves at the heart of life, will begin to create new forms of worship and human fellowship. We do not know. We do not dare to prophesy. At present everything is in the crucible, and we are in the hands of God. We do not doubt that He will do better for us than we can either ask or think, but the manner of it, that is to us unknown. During these months of agony and expectation, as life has become simpler in its demands, and the sense of mystery has deepened around us, we seem to have learned to trust God more, and at the same time to have less confidence than formerly that religion in the future will assume exactly the hue and pattern which are dear to our own mind. To those who share this experience with us it is impossible to enter upon any campaign for guiding the new life into our own carefully prepared channels. Through all these strange events God is speaking to us, and dealing intimately with our souls. It is for us to wait patiently for Him and not to prejudge the awful revealing of his purpose.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE DIVINE IMAGE.

To Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love
All pray in their distress;
And to these virtues of delight
Return their thankfulness.

For Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love
Is God, our father dear,
And Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love
Is Man, his child and care.

For Mercy has a human heart,
Pity a human face,
And Love, the human form divine,
And Peace, the human dress.

And every man, of every clime,
That prays in his distress,
Prays to the human form divine,
Love, Mercy, Pity, Peace.

And all must love the human form,
In heathen, turk, or jew;
Where Mercy, Love, and Pity dwell,
There God is dwelling too.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

YOUR enjoyment of the world is never right till every morning you awake in heaven; see yourself in your Father's palace; and look upon the skies, the earth, and the air as celestial joys; having such a reverend esteem of them all as if you were among the angels.

You never enjoy the world aright, till the sea itself floweth in your veins, till you are clothed with the heavens, and crowned with the stars: and perceive yourself to be sole heir of the whole world, and more than so, because men are in it who are every one sole heirs as well as you. Till you can sing and rejoice and delight in God, as misers do in gold, and kings in sceptres, you never enjoy the world.

Till your spirit filleth the whole world, and the stars are your jewels; till you are as familiar with the ways of God in all ages as with your walk and table; till you are intimately acquainted with that shady nothing out of which the world was made: till you love men so as to desire their happiness, with a thirst equal to the zeal of your own: till you delight in God for being good to all: you never enjoy the world.

THOMAS TRAHERNE.

LET us not seek out of Thee what we can find only in Thee, O Lord, peace and rest, and joy and bliss, which abide only in Thine abiding joy. Lift up our souls above the weary round of harassing thoughts to Thy eternal Presence. Lift up our souls to the pure, bright, serene, radiant atmosphere of Thy Presence, that there we may breathe freely, there repose in Thy love, there be at rest from ourselves and from all things that weary us, and then return arrayed with Thy peace to do and bear what shall please Thee. Amen.

THE LAKE DISTRICT IN WINTER.

"VERY delightful in summer, but I don't think I could stand it in winter." How often we, who have stood it for a quarter of a century, hear the above, or some similar remark, made during the months of July and August. Except for the heather—I grant that where heather grows it makes a colossal exception—those two are the months during which the general colour of the landscape is more monotonous than at any other time of the year. In June there is still variety in the greens of the leaves and even of the grasses. By September there are warm tints on the bracken, reeds and sedges are yellowing fast, while in the woods the rowans stand out as patches of glowing scarlet, and there are already fringes and splashes of colour among other trees which hint at the glories of crimson and gold and russet which late October and early November provide for us in rich abundance. If there is a great deal of rain in the summer holidays—there often is—the average tourist concludes that if he came in winter he would find it very much more rainy. The facts do not support this inference.

As for this winter the best that can be said for it is that it has outdone most of its predecessors in enabling Lodore Falls to "come down" week after week in the grand style so well described in Southey's rhyme. Week after week last summer and autumn Lodore took a holiday. He refused to do any rushing or gushing, or dashing or splashing, but just trickled gently over his rocks and among his ferns and mosses, and instead of roaring a greeting to his mile-distant neighbour, Barrow Fall, as he is doing to-day, he murmured softly to the birds and beasties on his banks that it was a glorious time, and he had not taken things so easily for many a year. If Lodore took it easy, so did the Rivers Derwent and Greta, and a host of merry becks. Indeed, the smallest becks first lost themselves among their pebbles and then dried up and were not. The Greta and Derwent could not quite manage that, but they struck work, and refused to turn any more water-wheels. The dippers and water wagtails, which were accustomed to keep at a respectful distance from the pitiless wheels, suddenly found them harmless, and boldly sought their prey under and about them. Day by day we met the great wood waggons coming towards the town with heavy loads of tree trunks for the woodyard; but when we wondered why the loads of firewood we had ordered weeks before were not delivered, we found on inquiry that the drought must cease before we could get any more wood. "How can I saw wood for ye when the Greta is too low to turn the wheels of my sawmill?" The trout and other fish had but shallow pools to hide in, and could easily be caught by hand in the high-lying becks. But day after day we revelled in the sunshine, and every evening when the tireless mountain slopes turned a pinkish purple in the far distance, and a brownish pink in the middle distance, we rejoiced, for we knew by that token that we were sure of, at least, two or three more fine days. "But all this will have to be paid for," said, some weather-wise folk. If we are, indeed, paying for it now the sensible among us do not grumble.

Grumble? How dare we ever grumble at the weather in Lakeland? I cannot quite agree with Ruskin when he says that there is no such thing as bad weather, but only different kinds of pleasant weather. Yet if he is wrong, he is not far wrong, provided one has to endure the worst of his different kinds in the country where the air is sweet and fresh, and the drops that the south-westerly gale flings in your face are wholly free from smuts. We all have to tramp through mud in the country, but it is not the sticky, greasy mud of cities. The dripping leaves, the sodden turf are clean. There is no gleam of steel blue or pearl grey on the wet trunk of a tall beech in a town park in the West Riding or the Black Country. You may take pleasure in the form and pose of the ivy which clings to the grimy trunk of an old oak in that same park; but any delight you get from colour as associated with that ivy is in conscious or unconscious, recollection of other ivy, seen far away from the dim rich city; ivy such as we see every day, so clean that the veining is clearly visible in the smallest leaf, and you would be put to it if you were asked to count the shades of green and brown, of pale yellow and dull red that are to be found on the leaves and stems which drape one trunk and wander among the herbage at its feet.

If winter in Lakeland needs an advocate it finds one in its own poet, Robert Southey. We know from his letters that he did not at first take to the idea of making Keswick his permanent home. Some time after he had, in 1803, joined the curiously mixed household already living in Greta Hall, he writes, "I have no fixture feeling about me, no symptoms of striking root here." Later letters tell how bit by bit the lovely scenery won upon him. He wishes his correspondents in the south could enjoy it with him: "O, that you could at this moment see the moonlight upon Derwentwater, and the cloud in which the moon herself is hidden." It is the winter beauty which appeals to him, for in February, 1804, we find him writing, "Summer is not the season for this country. Coleridge says, and says well, that then it is like a theatre at noon. There are no goings on under a clear sky; but at all other seasons there is such shifting of shades, such islands of light, such columns and buttresses of sunshine, as might almost make a painter burn his brushes, as the sorcerers did their books of magic when they saw the divinity which rested upon the apostles. The very snow which you would, perhaps, think must monotonise the mountains, gives new varieties; it brings out their recesses and designates all their inequalities, it impresses a better feeling of their height, and it reflects such tints of saffron, or fawn, or rose-colour to the evening sky. O Maria Santissima! Mount Horeb with the glory upon its summit might have been more glorious, but not more beautiful than old Skiddaw in his winter pelisse of ermine. I will not quarrel with the frost.....The lakeside has such ten thousand charms: a fleece of snow or of the hoar frost lies on the fallen trees or large stones; the grass-points that just peer above the water are powdered with diamonds, the ice on the margin with chains of crystal, and such wavy lines of beauty as mock all art."

THE FREE CATHOLIC MOVEMENT AND THE OLDER UNITARIANISM.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—As one who is in sympathy with certain aspects both of the Free Catholic movement and of the older Unitarianism, may I be allowed some expression of what to me are the grounds for undying gratitude to the latter, however much the former may represent the new life which we should ever be ready to welcome in our midst? Although the correspondence in your last issue shows that there is a real response to such a movement, this is all the more reason for pointing out that it is not the high beauty of the older faith which is at fault, but that the generation of them to whom it was as passionate a possession as Free Catholicism is to some of our contemporaries is passing away.

To one who is old enough to value as one of her most precious memories and inspirations the high, unadorned, spiritual beauty of the faith of the older generation, a faith won by quiet, strenuous, intellectual toil and real sacrifice of material ease and social position, the idea that the Unitarian worship of those days was cold and inadequate is almost ludicrous. One often sighs, indeed, in these distracted days, for the peace and blessing of those bygone Sundays: the simple, reverent, and deeply spiritual service in the quiet old Meeting House, in the company of those dear and revered elders who would gladly have gone to the stake for their faith, and encompassed by the sense of the unity of all mankind—non-Christian as well as Christian—in the love of the One Father.

It may be that in those days of the seventies and eighties which now begin to seem like a dream—yet, even as dreams, most true—the upward spiral, represented by so many fair hopes of brotherhood and progress, did actually bring us nearer to the calm ultimate Reality than now, when the backward curve leads us to clutch desperately at symbols to sustain us in our sickening sense of impotence amidst the infinite mystery of things. It may be that the movement towards symbolism will bring us to a higher curve of the spiral, as showing that the most material and baffling things must be harmonised with any "common denominator" capable of partially solving the riddle of existence. But let us not forget that the heart of the older faith still beats as warmly as that of the new for those who associate it with their best and holiest aims and enthusiasms, and that the very name "Unitarian" is often, to one's glad surprise, identified by the "orthodox" people one meets with the utmost reverence for single-mindedness, spirituality, and public-spirited work. These great traditions surely have a future, all the greater, one may venture to hope, when the temporary interests of nationalism and patriotism shall have passed by, leaving us with a more urgent need than ever of a practical realisation of the universal brotherhood of man, in the West and in the East, implied in the Fatherhood of God as manifested through the divinely human personality of Jesus Christ. To some He must ever be our Living Way to the Father, but to others it suffices that He taught us the awful beauty of the faith that our Father in Heaven needs no intermediary if we approach Him "in spirit and in truth."—Yours, &c. "CATHOLIC"—THE WORD AND THE IDEA.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—For Christians who affirm, as Free Catholics do, their absolute moral and spiritual loyalty to our Lord Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and their faith in him as God's supreme gift for the salvation of the world, particular churches and denominations have, at best, a derivative, and even a subordinate authority. It was not Luther nor any Protestant assembly, but the Roman Catholic Council of Constance (1414–18) that sought to end the Great Schism by deposing three rival Popes, and electing another, and by declaring that "every lawfully convoked Ecumenical Council representing the Church derives its authority immediately from Christ, and every one, the Pope included, is subject to it in matters of faith, in the healing of schism, and the reformation of the Church." It is true that the Roman Church has since declared the folly that the Pope is infallible. But the decree of this Council is a decree that every Catholic-minded Protestant should recall and promulgate afresh as one of the charters of the Church's liberty. In it is to be found in principle the cure for all our ecclesiastical sectarianisms and individualisms and anarchisms. Sectarianism does not consist in a passionate devotion to a particular church or in the frank recognition of the convenience of having different denominations. The guilt of sectarianism is incurred when each of different branches of the Church of Christ arrogantly claims that it and it alone is the true vine; when one particular sect asserts an exclusive right to the only way. For the Christian, Christ is the only way—the Way, the Truth, the Life. God's mercy in Christ is broader than the measure of man's mind, and includes all who strive to worship in spirit and in truth. It is both the right and the duty of every one to attach himself to that particular fellowship of souls where he finds heart, conscience, will, and intellect—in a word, his complete personality, most fruitfully stimulated, most truly satisfied, most vitally nourished. Sectarianism is the attempt to divide Christ; the vice of the narrow temper that wishes the limits of a Church's comprehension to be his personal limits, that says to a sincere disciple, "Thou shalt not believe more or less or other than I do," when the more or less or other is not inconsistent with Christian morals and Christian faith. There are limits of practicable comprehension in any given type of worship; but there is no limit to true Christian charity, any more than there is to the mercy and redemption of God. One man who is devotionally helped by a rich choral service may be quite indifferent to the frozen music of architecture, and blind to the expressiveness of colour and form and the visible symbols that appeal through the eye. But the ear ought not, therefore, to say to the eye nor the eye to the ear, "I have no need of thee." Too often we thoughtlessly or selfishly forget the presence in our churches of the physically deaf and the physically blind, and that the deaf may be helped by what they see and the blind by what they hear.

There are exceptional cases of men who can best worship alone, shutting eye and ear, yet realising the mystic Presence in their own hearts, "the Dweller in the Innermost." It was a Roman Catholic who said that "to some there is revealed a sacrament greater than that of the Real Presence, a sacrament of the Manifest Presence, which is, and is more than, the sum of all the sacraments." There are others, and these are numerous, who find the highest reality of all sacraments in the features of nature, mountains and forests, seas and skies, sheltered valleys and wide-stretching plains, storm and calm, the flooded gold of day and the starlit mystery of night. But, again, many find in the art and craft of man's cunning hand, in the creations of man's passionate mind, great poetry and sublime prose, what they search for in vain in a physical nature full of terror, pain, and death. For some it is History, the moving drama of Humanity through all its tragic and glorious vicissitudes, and especially in the development of the Christian Church through all its shames and sanctities—it is History itself that is the one stupendous sacrament in and through which they feel the spirit of God ever providentially active and abiding. And some there are who feel not one of these, or some of these, but all of these in varying degrees of convincingness and power, and often according to varying moods and seasons. The Church of Christ is gracious and broad enough to provide room for all. It has a ministry, a saving Health, a redemptive Life for all Mankind and for the entire manhood of every member of it.

But it is important to grasp the distinction between mere world-wideness and Catholicity. Sin is world-wide, but sin is not, therefore, a "note" of Catholicity. A Church is catholic when it has the moral and spiritual quality that entitles it to become world-wide. It is that essential quality by virtue of which it is potentially redemptive of all mankind, and is ideally able "to sum up all things in Christ" (Eph. i. 10). We are glad to be able to agree with Mr. Lacey's "final conclusion" in his suggestive book, 'Catholicity,' where he says (p. 58), that "Catholicity is the temper that seizes and holds the ordinary way of unity, without contempt, without neglect, without evasion, but which can also, in case of need, throw itself upon the guidance of the Divine Spirit, and strike out for new and untrodden ways."

Has not the need arisen in our own day? We believe that it has. The late Father Tyrrell in a letter (see 'Autobiography and Life of George Tyrrell,' vol. ii. p. 408) to the present writer said, "Where I hesitate to join you is in the hope or feasibility of any sort of new communion." He recognised that there are limits to the duty of conformity and the fear of schisms, but he believed that the justifying conditions of separation obtain very rarely. A new Catholicism would, he said, be a new sect. With Irish humour, mingled with pathetic wistfulness, he added, "What may partly realise your programme will be, perhaps, a growing multitude of excommuniés from various denominations sitting, as it were, on the doorsteps all down the street, waiting vainly for readmission to their several homes; bound by a strong spiritual bond, tighter than that of any external institution, and reacting powerfully for good, by their collective significance, on the more comfortable indoor folk." And he concluded by announcing his own intention to "stand on the doorstep and knock and ring, and make myself a nuisance in every possible way." The result, unhappily, in his own case, was not very encouraging. He was excommunicated. He died on the doorstep, "fortified by the rites of the Church," administered compassionately by a passing priest who thereby brought upon himself the severe censure of the comfortable indoor folk. Modern religious thought owes more than can easily be expressed to Father Tyrrell. But the tragic result of modernism in his own life, and in the life of others, suggests that we must find another way. This, we believe, we have found in the Free Catholic movement. It remains to be seen how far the readers of THE INQUIRER will assume towards it an attitude of supercilious superiority, or of benevolent neutrality, or of active sympathy.—Yours, &c. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

'FREE CATHOLICISM.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Whatever criticism we may have to offer as regards 'The Free Catholic,' we owe it a debt for making it clear that to be a Free Catholic one must accept a doctrinal position that many of us have long outgrown. We have to "affirm our absolute moral and spiritual loyalty to Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and our faith in him as God's supreme gift for the salvation of the world." We have to "worship God as revealed and redemptively active in and through Jesus Christ." We have to "look to him (I leave the capital "H" to Free Catholics) as the Way, the Truth, and the Life." We have to accept the position that there "can be no peace save to those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." (Vide Free Catholic, passim.). We see, then, that Free Catholicism is neither "Free" nor "Catholic." Time was when those of us who ventured to suggest this were pursued with nameless objurgations. Now its advocates admit it, and the Theist, the Agnostic, the Jew, and a very large proportion of us Unitarians are excluded from the Free Catholic Church, even should we wish to join. With you I regret that this matter has been brought forward at the present time, but still more that it should be brought forward at all Its advocacy has done harm in the past and may do more. If the Conference Report on the falling-off in attendance at public worship had faced the question boldly, it would have stated that these peculiar ideas of some of our ministers formed one chief cause in some centres. How many of us are there who cannot tell of certain of our young people whose downward path to orthodoxy has been opened up and rendered smooth by the teaching of the professors of Free Catholicism? Nor is it to be wondered at. This apotheosis of Jesus, this talk of Sacraments, this use of symbolical expressions, this speaking of the "Holy Eucharist," the "Altar," and the like, for perfectly simple ceremonies and articles of furniture, this baptising "in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit," this donning of the surplice and the stole, tend to the disintegration of our body. I distrust the High Church party among us, even when presenting us with the gift of The Free Catholic. They may be actuated by good intentions, but like most well-meaning people they do immense harm.—Yours, &c.

The volume, which deals with the history of Westgate Chapel, Lewes, is based upon original research, and will throw a good deal of fresh light upon the early days of Nonconformity in Sussex. It will be illustrated by Mr. Edmund H. A WEEK-END IN A HOME CAMP.

Perhaps it wouldn't really matter if the name were mentioned, but as it is correct to locate places as "somewhere in England," that vague description must suffice. I shall remember it as a place where even a careful man must spend extravagant sums on taxies; still better by its glorious night skies; yet more by its clouds of driven rain and sleet, and by its great view over miles of landscape rolling like wide seas.

In some districts where the camps are thickly spread you have to find your Unitarians anywhere within a hundred square miles or more. Here, however, there was concentration, with very distinct advantages. Once at the centre you could reach any point of the camp in half an hour, and this meant not only that the men could be easily visited, but also that they, without much difficulty, could make a rendezvous. Then Lieut. B. had promised assistance, and a plan of campaign was soon worked out. Most of the men had replied to the greeting; they would be at liberty at one time or another, only a few were away on the much desired and much deserved leave. In a short time several fixtures were made. For Saturday night we engaged a room in a cosy café in the town, next we waited on a minister, and afterwards the friendly minister, along with us, waited on the deacon of the Congregational Church, and it was arranged that the schoolroom should be at our disposal for the little service that we intended for our men. Next we called on the Rev. Joseph Wood, who lived a good deal less than a hundred miles away, to see if he would be able to lead our worship. That satisfactorily settled we were back again to the camp, where three Unitarians and a Wesleyan produced and issued some time before midnight the following circular:—

"To-morrow evening the Unitarians in the camp are asked to foregather at .....Fall in, 6.30; dismiss, 9; cookhouse, 6.30–9. Items for the programme will be welcomed. On Sunday at 6.30 a Service will be held in the schoolroom of the .....kindly lent for the occasion. It is hoped the Rev. Joseph Wood will be present and deliver an address. We hope that all Unitarians in the camp will take this opportunity of making each other's acquaintance, and that they will come both on Saturday and Sunday. Kindly mention this to all Unitarians and urge them to come."

Saturday morning was spent in finding out that the men who could come, and those who could not, were either keenly disappointed or keenly anticipative. The little room was full, and there need have been no anxiety about the programme. It would not have mattered at all, because everybody wanted to talk about his folk and faith, to discuss the happy chance that had brought us together, and the prospect of "to-morrow," and "couldn't there really be opportunity found for a few meetings while they were on 'this side?'" On Sunday morning many of us were at the 9 o'clock Nonconformist service in the Y.M.C.A. hut; some further calls on officers and men, hairbreadth escapes from disaster in the flooded "lines," and finally an arrival at the billet, draggled, soaked, and stained as any warrior from the trenches. Then, in the evening, a happy service, with prayer and a preaching by Mr. Wood that the men will not forget; a service followed by a friendly chat and a promise by Mr. Wood that he would co-operate in any arrangements we were able to make for the proposed services, a pledge that there should be another social before long, next a sing-song, an hour's hymn-singing, and then good-night before the "report." It was a good time; the men were surprised that there were so many Unitarians in the camp: "Why, is he a Unitarian?" as this name and the other was mentioned; and why hadn't we known each other sooner? So the next step was to issue to each man a list of the names and camp addresses of all those whom we had met or heard of, and this, too, was voted the right thing.

It was one of the best week-ends I have spent, and I think that the men would say the same for themselves. I am afraid I exceeded my instructions in arranging for the social; but what an opportunity would have been missed if that Saturday night had been left idle,

I only wish one had the wherewithal to invite men in the same way wherever it is possible, as well as visit them in camp or billet, and that the generosity of the Association could be supplemented by the goodwill of many whose hearts are with the boys who are waiting till their call shall come. T. P. SPEDDING.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Contributors to the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Salaries was held at Dr. Williams's Library, London, on Tuesday, February 8, Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, President, in the chair. There were also present the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, F. K. Freeston, W. G. Tarrant, J. Wood, and Messrs. Ronald P. Jones (Hon. Treasurer), E. J. Blake, W. Byng Kenrick, T. Oliver Lee, G. H. Leigh, G. J. Notcutt, J. T. Perry, Percy Preston, Ion Pritchard, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, acting Hon. Secretary.

The following is an abstract of the Annual Report:—

"During the past year the Managers have carried on the administration of the Fund on the lines which were described fully in their last Report. More money has been available from the new Fund, and steady progress has been made in the adjustment of the work to the new conditions. A year ago it was feared that the special circumstances of the war might place the finances of some congregations in a critical position which would require the consideration of your Managers. Fortunately, this has not been the case. Reports which have been submitted to them for inspection during the past year show very little, if any, shrinkage of local income. From the point of view of carrying on the work of the churches this is a very satisfactory feature, though the Managers are aware that it is only too likely that many congregations will feel the after-effects of the war in depleted income. There has been a substantial increase during the past year in the number of congregations receiving aid from the Fund. In the last Annual Report the names of 71 congregations appear, namely, 51 in England, 12 in Wales, and 8 in Ireland. Twenty new applicants for grants have been received during the year. Of these 15 have been accepted, namely, 13 in England, 1 in Wales, and 1 in Ireland. Among these are seven congregations which had received grants hitherto from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

"There has been a good deal of correspondence during the year with some local associations. The Managers are anxious to keep in close touch with them, and welcome every opportunity for the interchange of information and advice. The need of making the membership of the Board as representative as possible of different parts of the country is also steadily kept in view. The Managers record with deep regret the death of their former colleague, Mr. William Long. Mr. Long was an original member of the Board; he acted as President for several years, and always took a deep interest in the work of the Fund.

"During the year Mr. P. J. Worsley resigned his position as one of the Managers owing to his inability to be present at the meetings. His resignation was accepted with great regret, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to him for his long and able services.

"The income of the Fund amounted to £3,281, an increase of nearly £500 over that of the previous year, due entirely to receipts from investments, since the list of subscriptions unfortunately shows a decrease of about £30, owing to the loss of seven subscriptions and the reduction of certain others.

"The Managers wish to express their indebtedness to the Rev. W. H. Drummond, who has continued to act as Hon. Secretary to the Fund in the absence during the year of Mr. H. F. Pearson on military duty. The Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Ronald P. Jones, though absent from London during the second half of the year for the same reason, found it possible to carry on the work of the Treasurership, and wishes to express his thanks to the new Auditor for considerable assistance in the preparation of the accounts, &c., for the Annual Meeting."

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Annual Report and the Treasurer's Statement of Accounts, spoke of the great care which was taken by the ministers in the consideration of grants. They recognised that at the present time there was special need for generous treatment, as many congregations had suffered from depletion owing to the large number of their members engaged in military service. The ministers who were carrying on the work under difficulties are receiving the special care and solicitude of the Fund. In view of the new religious opportunity arising from the war it was, he felt, of primary importance that our congregations should be maintained as adequately as possible, and be enabled to take their part in any revival of religious life in the country. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. J. Wood, and carried.

The Rev. W. H. Drummond moved that Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke be appointed President for the ensuing year. Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, in seconding, spoke of the close connection of the President with the work of the Fund for many years, and the long family tradition which he represented. Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke briefly returned thanks for this new expression of confidence.

The following officers were re-appointed and thanked for their past services:—Hon. Treasurer, Mr. Ronald P. Jones; Hon. Secretary, Mr. H. F. Pearson; Acting Secretary, the Rev. W. H. Drummond; Auditor, Mr. Herbert Gimson. The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library for the use of their rooms for the Annual Meeting and the meetings of the Board during the past year.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE first meeting of the new Committee was held on the 26th ult. at the Memorial Hall, Manchester. There were present the Revs. Dr. Hargrove (President), D. Agate, J. H. Bibby, W. T. Bushrod, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, H. E. Dowson, J. Ellis, E. D. P. Evans, A. Hall, F. Hankinson, F. H. Jones, Dr. Mellor, J. A. Pearson, W. W. C. Pope, D. M. Robson, A. L. Smith, C J. Street, Joseph Wood, Mrs. Barlow, Mrs. S. Martineau, Miss Winser, Messrs. J. H. Brooks, H. P. Greg, W. B. Kenrick, F. W. Monks, T. F. Robinson, G. E. Verity, J. Wigley, G. W. R. Wood, and the Secretary (the Rev. J. Harwood).

Apologies for absence were received from the Revs. Dr. Carpenter, W. H. Drummond, F. K. Freeston, C. A. Giniver, H. Gow, J. J. Magill, W. G. Tarrant, Messrs. H. Baily, H. Chatfeild Clarke, H. R. Rathbone, and A. S. Thew.

Among other business the following items were dealt with. The Rev. R. N. Cross, Messrs. E. O. Dodgson (Leeds), Lawrence D. Holt (Liverpool), Ronald P. Jones (London), J. T. Perry (Nottingham), and L. N. Williams (Aberdare), were co-opted members of the Committee. Changes in the list of ministers made by the Joint Committee were reported. It was stated that a large edition of Prof. Gilbert Murray's address on 'Ethical Problems of the War' was nearly sold out. The question of supplying the pulpits of ministers who undertake military service arose, and it was agreed that the arrangements were best left in the hands of the congregations concerned and the District Associations. Conversation arose on a letter which had been received, calling attention to repeated attacks on the Conference in a certain newspaper. Apropos of a joint appeal recently made to all religious bodies in the country by their several representatives, the opinion was expressed that the President of the Conference, as holding a position similar to that held by the official representatives in other churches, was the proper person to act in such cases. The question whether any, and if so what, use might be made by lay-preachers of the course of reading and examinations prescribed for lay-workers was referred to the Committee on the Supply of Ministers. It was agreed warmly to commend the proposal to hold some special religious service for young people and others on joining our churches, and the President and Mr. Wood were requested to prepare a short paper on the subject for the consideration of the next meeting.

The Treasurer reported that after paying accounts which he presented there would be a balance in hand of £14 9*s.* 4*d.*, and that on account of the appeal for the Sustentation Fund there remained uncollected a balance of £3,141 5*s.*

The officers and Vice-Presidents were appointed as an Executive Committee to act in matters of urgency between meetings of the Committee, to whom they should report their proceedings.

The Revs. Dr. Carpenter, E. D. P. Evans, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Joseph Wood, and Messrs. W. B. Kenrick and F. W. Monks were appointed representatives of the Conference on the Committee on the Supply of Ministers. The Rev. H. E. Dowson and Messrs. R. P. Jones and W. B. Kenrick, with the President and Secretary (ex-officio) were appointed members of the Ministerial Settlements Board. An animated discussion took place as to the desirability, under present circumstances, of continuing to appoint a representative to the National Peace Council. By twelve to eleven it was decided to do so, and the Rev. F. H. Jones was chosen.

It was unanimously agreed to commend to the sympathy and support of all Congregations on the Roll Mrs. Bernard Allen's Belgian Hospital Fund. The next meeting of the Committee was fixed for Whitsuntide in London, and the following one for October in Nottingham.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of this Association was held in the Bournemouth Unitarian Church, West Hill Road, on Wednesday, February 2, the President, Mrs. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, in the chair.

The Executive met in the Church Hall early in the afternoon, and at 5 o'clock Mrs. Bernard Allen of Hampstead gave an address in the church on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund. There was a full attendance of members of the Association and other friends. In several churches of the district work for the objects of the Fund is being carried on, and Mrs. Conway, in welcoming Mrs. Allen, said that they felt it a privilege so to meet her and hear from her own lips an account of what was being done. Copies of the report of the first year's operations, which appeared in The Inquirer of January 8, had been distributed, and Mrs. Allen at the opening of her address dwelt upon the religious significance of their efforts, as an expression of sympathy for a downtrodden and martyred people. She described the wide extent of the support received and the steady growth of the work, telling, with many vivid personal touches, how one need after another had arisen, and had been met in faith that the necessary means would be forthcoming. They had been able to go steadily forward, and still had great opportunities for much needed service. She had complete confidence in the continued generous response of the churches to that appeal.

The Rev. V. D. Davis, in proposing a vote of thanks, touched upon the element of romance in the story of the Fund, and said that what they had heard from Mrs. Allen, and the appeal of her presence, would add a fresh incentive to what they were doing in their working parties for the Fund. They had been filled with admiration for the courage, the remarkable capacity and devotion with which Mrs. Allen had originated and carried on that work. The resolution was seconded by Mrs. Thorne Waite, and very heartily carried. In her reply Mrs. Allen called attention to a number of baskets, the work of wounded Belgian soldiers, which she had brought with her, all of which were sold before the meeting broke up. The collection for the Fund amounted to £12 4*s.* 6*d.*

After tea in the Church Hall, the Annual Business Meeting of the Association was held in the Church. After an opening hymn and prayer offered by the Rev. W. B. Matthews, the President introduced the business. Miss Spencer, the Treasurer, presented the balance sheet, the Rev. V. D. Davis read the annual report, and the Rev. J. Ruddle the report of the Sunday School Union. These were adopted, on the motion of the President, seconded by the Rev. G. W. Thompson.

The opening and concluding passages of the report were as follows :—" A report of the work of the Association, and of the churches included within its borders, is not easy to make for such a year as that on which we have now to look back. There has been no break in the clouds of war ; the destructive storm has but swept further over Europe, and has intensified the stress of the world-tragedy. The whole life of our nation has been bent upon the duties thus laid upon it, of endurance, of self-sacrifice and strenuous service, and these paramount claims have stood in the way of any further developments of religious activity on other, more accustomed lines. As regards the Association itself, it must be confessed that little has been done, beyond one modest new departure for the strengthening of the work of the Sunday Schools (in arranging for an interchange of visits by teachers of the several Schools).....The burden of this time our churches bear with the rest of the country, and, indeed, with the whole community of nations involved in the awful upheaval of the war. We must hold upon our way, assured that by whatever difficulties they may be faced, their testimony is still required, and service is demanded of them with even greater urgency than ever. The hearts of men are stirred to deeper religious needs, and the churches, as homes of the Spirit, must answer to those needs, keeping fresh the fountains of inspiration, for the strengthening of faith, the solace of grief, and the accomplishment of a better hope for mankind. In work and prayer they must do their part, loyal to duty, in willing sacrifice, that truth and right may be vindicated in the world, and in the supreme power of love at last achieve the victory of the Kingdom of God."

Mrs. Conway, as President, and the other officers were re-elected, and, on the motion of Mr. Charles Isaacs, it was agreed that in future the Annual Meeting should be held in the early summer of each year. On the motion of the Rev. W. B. Matthews, seconded by Miss Eiloart, a hearty vote of thanks was passed to the lay-preachers of the district, and especially to Mr. S. C. Ryley, for his services at Emerson Hall. On the motion of the Rev. H. S. Solly, seconded by Mrs. William Carter, a resolution was passed, expressing sincere regret that the Rev. W. B. Matthews had felt obliged to resign his charge at Poole, and to an expression of warm personal regard adding the hope that he might still find abundant opportunities for ministerial service in the district.

Votes of thanks to the President and the Bournemouth Congregation, another hymn, and the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. H. S. Solly, brought the meeting to a close.

A course of ten lectures on 'Ideals in Social Reconstruction,' which begins to-day, is being given, under the auspices of the Theosophical Society, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, Langham Place, on Saturdays at 3 p.m., during the present month, March, and April. The lecturers include Mr. C. Delisle Burns, Mr. William M. Poel, Miss Margaret McMillan, Mr. Ebenezer Howard, Mr. W. R. Lethaby, and Mr. G. S. Arundale, Secretary of the Theosophical Society. Among the special subjects which are being dealt with are 'The Unity of European Civilisation,' 'National and Imperial Ideals,' 'The Women of the Nation,' 'The City as it Might Be,' and 'The Citizen as he Should Be.' Admission is free, but there are reserved seats at 2*s.* 6*d.* and 1*s.* Full course, 20*s.* and 8*s.* Application should be made to the Booking Office, Langham Place.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Dudley.—The Rev. E. Glyn Evans, minister of the Old Meeting House, Dudley, has voluntarily sacrificed his non-commissioned rank and stripes as a Quarter-Master Serjeant, in connection with the Home depot staff of his ambulance, in order to join the field hospital section at the front. Mr. Evans is now " somewhere in France " as an ordinary private of the Ambulance Corps, rendering first aid to the sick and wounded who come direct from firing-line trenches to the hospital station, where the medical work is carried on within sound of the guns.

Lincoln.—In connection with High Street Unitarian Church there has been formed a Women's Guild and Bright Hour, which meets every Wednesday in the church vestry at 2.45. The present object of the society is to provide a cheerful and bright centre full of encouragement, especially for the many women who are passing through times of anxiety and bereavement. Sewing is to be done by members for the Belgian Hospital Fund. The officers elected at the inaugural meeting held on January 25 are as follows : President, Mrs. H. W. King ; Vice-President, Mrs. E. Swaby ; Secretary, Miss M. Lowry ; and Treasurer, Mrs. Bone. A special service on behalf of the Women's Guild was held on Sunday evening last, and the collection given for the purchase of materials for the Belgian Hospital Fund. Private Henry Hall, R.A.M.C. (late minister of Kirkcaldy Unitarian Church), preached to a crowded congregation on the 'Divineness of Heroism.' The collection amounted to £2. These collections on behalf of the Materials Fund are to be made monthly. The congregation on Sunday evening filled the church, and additional chairs were used. This was the first service held at 6 o'clock instead of in the afternoon. Commencing with February 20 the minister will give four Sunday evening addresses on 'Democracy and the War.'

Liverpool : Ullet Road Church.—A charming and patriotic entertainment, in aid of the Belgian Hospital Fund, was given on Friday, February 4, in the Church Hall by Miss Pickering and her friends. The hall was crowded by a very appreciative audience, which included thirty convalescent soldiers from the Holt Hospital. The programmes, sold at 1*s.* each, were notable for a suggestive frontispiece, beautifully drawn by Miss Nora Fry. The most popular items of the evening were the dances, delightfully executed by clever little girls in appropriate costume ; a novel " Statue Dance," exemplifying English sports, and Welsh, Scotch, Irish and English national dances ; but the whole entertainment was of a high order of merit. The Rev. J. Collins Odgers presided. The amount realised by the sale of the programmes was £14 13*s.* 9*d.*, from which sum there was no subtraction for expenses. This effort constitutes yet another happy contribution made by Ullet Road Church to further and assist Mrs. Allen's admirable work. The wounded heroes received a hearty round of applause on leaving, led by Mr. Odgers.

Norwich. — On Thursday afternoon, February 3, the Octagon Guild of Service provided an excellent entertainment for wounded soldiers from the Bracondale Hospital. About thirty-six of them were brought by special car to the Martineau Hall, where they joined with members of the Guild in games and songs. Tea was served at 4 P.M., after which the visitors were entertained by a play. At the close of the proceedings the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, on behalf of the Guild, expressed the pleasure it had given them to have the soldiers at the Hall that afternoon, to which they responded by giving three hearty cheers for their hosts.

Stalybridge: the late Mr. James Oliver.—It is with deep regret that we record the death of Mr. James Oliver of Stalybridge on January 30, in the 42nd year of his age. With a deep and real admiration of the purity, goodness, integrity, and sincerity which he had seen exemplified in worthy men and women about whom he delighted to converse, he went forth to life with a high ideal and a noble purpose. He was devoted to his home. He loved his Church. He took pride in the thought that his father, who happily is still with us, was one of its founders. He laboured strenuously for its welfare, and for many years held the office of secretary. He was a most efficient organiser, and anything he undertook he did thoroughly. He was anxious that the fine spirit of the pioneers should be emulated, and that the present generation should carry on the church to greater power of influence for good. Since 1903 he has represented the church on the East Cheshire Christian Union, and since 1904 he has been elected annually on the Executive of that body. During those years he has shown keen interest in the churches of the district, and his counsels and services have been greatly valued. He was active in the public affairs of the town, and his organising ability has been at the service of many good causes. In an unobtrusive way he has been the friend and helper of many who were troubled and needy. In all he undertook he showed strong conscientiousness and a keen sense of duty. His departure leaves a gap that cannot easily be filled. His last act of service was to present a Report at the Executive Meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union. This he did, as was characteristic of him, from a sense of duty, although he was in great pain. On the evening of the day following, he underwent an operation for appendicitis, which was apparently very successful. After some days there seemed to be every prospect of recovery, when, suddenly, there came a complete collapse, and our friend passed peacefully away. The interment took place on Wednesday, February 2, after a service at the home, at Mottram Cemetery, at which the Rev. H. E. Dowson and the Rev. John Ellis officiated. Although the weather was most inclement, a large company—including the Mayor, the Town Clerk, the Mayor's Chaplain, and other officials of the Borough, representatives of the Stalybridge Unitarian Church Trustees and Committee, the Rifle Club, of which Mr. Oliver was a member, the employees of Bayley, Oliver & Co., and other societies with which Mr. Oliver had been associated—assembled to pay a tribute to our departed friend. Last Sunday morning, a Memorial Service was held at the Unitarian Church, which was attended by a large congregation of representative men.

Woolwich.—The Annual Meeting of the Woolwich and Plumstead Unitarian Congregation was held on Sunday evening, February 6, after the service, which was conducted by the Rev. J. A. Pearson. In the Annual Report it was shown that the progress made was rather due to the increased loyalty of the members than to an increased membership. The choir, under Mr. Pollard, had practised regularly during the year, and their efforts had met with no little success. An Adult School, which started in November, was proving very helpful and instructive. The Sunday School had increased its membership. The Rev. J. A. Pearson, in seconding the adoption of the report, congratulated the meeting on the cheerful and hearty spirit displayed. A resolution thanking the London District Unitarian Society for its support and the District Minister for his help and interest was carried unanimously. Another resolution expressing the congregation's appreciation of the work of the Rev. D. D. Evans was heartily supported.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

FOOD OR ALCOHOL?

Some facts need to be pressed home in regard to the fearful waste of food-stuffs involved in the production of beer and spirits. The Parliamentary War Savings Committee, in the statement for economy, declare that "the most obvious saving that could be made is in the abandonment or greatly reduced consumption of wine, beer and spirits," and some idea of what that means may be gathered from some figures given by Mr. Guy Hayler. The amount of food material destroyed in the manufacture of the two last-named, is, he says, over seventy million bushels yearly. If made into bread this grain would produce more than 1,250,000,000 4lb. loaves, enough to feed the whole population for more than four months each year. This waste of food material becomes increasingly serious when it is remembered that we have to depend on foreign grain for five out of six 4lb. loaves we require." If every family in the land were to cut their drink bill down by, say, one-half, the Parliamentary War Savings Committee state, the amount would come to £80,000,000 per annum. In time of peace even more than in time of war, that would be a very large sum to the good!

THE BRITISH BAEDEKER.

The once popular Baedeker is no longer regarded with favour by English-speaking people, and arrangements are being made by a private company, under the guidance of Mr. Findlay Muirhead and Dr. J. P. Muirhead, for the publication of a series of "all-British" guide-books on similar lines. Mr. Findlay Muirhead and his brother were for thirty years Mr. Baedeker's English co-editors, and were responsible for the volume dealing with the United Kingdom. The company will be known as "Muirhead Guide-Books, Ltd.," and Messrs. Macmillan & Co. are to be the publishers. The guides will be printed and the maps made entirely in this country, and the first volumes will deal with London, Paris, Belgium, and Northern France.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE print to-day an audited statement of the Accounts of the Belgian Hospital Fund to December 31, 1915. It will give our supporters a fresh assurance that the business arrangements are worthy of their confidence. The Statement is being forwarded to the headquarters of the Belgian Government. Along with our recent Report it will find a place in the golden book which is being prepared as a permanent record of the friendship and help which have been extended to Belgium in the time of her need. We must ask our contributors not to be misled by the size of the balance which happened to be at the bank when the accounts were made up. A large part of it was already pledged, and so many fresh demands have come in since the beginning of the year that we have not more at the present time than a very narrow margin of safety.

THE work, of course, must be continued —that is the will of all of us; and we have good reason to know that it is the desire of those whom we are so glad to serve. It is in the monotonous days, when the romantic freshness of a movement has become a little dim, that our generosity is tested. If things become more difficult for ourselves and our scale of living must be simpler, let us remember that the Belgian army, owing to the misfortunes which it has borne with such magnificent heroism, began far below the line of comfort where we may have to leave off. Even at the worst we shall still be living on a scale of plenty, which they have not known for many a day. We have nothing fresh to report about the scheme for the Recreation Hut at the moment, except to say that we are going into the whole matter in detail, and hope to be in a position very shortly to give the order for its erection. From further information which has reached us we are even more confident than we were, when we first wrote on the subject, of the urgency of the need and the great service which such a centre of recreation and noble influence will be able to render to the Belgian army. Those who know something of the value of the huts of the Y.M.C.A. and the Church Army to our own men will understand at once what we mean.

WE need hardly say that we welcome heartily the announcement that there is to be stricter supervision of Belgian relief funds raised in this country. At a time like the present useless funds ought to be suppressed, and every possible opening for fraud upon the charitable public must be stopped. Official recognition will take the form of a certificate issued by the Local Government Board after consultation with the Belgian Government. Funds like our own have everything to gain by this necessary element of public control. From the beginning we have been associated with M. Vandervelde's "Union des Comités"; our accounts have been audited twice in the course of twelve months, and all our work has been carried on in close consultation with the Belgian authorities on the spot. There have been no hoarding of funds and no slipshod methods.

THE opening of a new session of Parliament on Tuesday called forth words of grave warning from the Prime Minister. He spoke in terms of calm and unshaken confidence of victory, but he gave no indication that he expects it to come soon, and he bade us all realise, as we have not done yet, the tremendous cost. It is here that Parliament has a high function to perform. It can be a pattern to the nation of the self-control and disciplined strength which it desires to encourage in every citizen. There ought to be little toleration of men who arouse the suspicion that they speak to gratify their own vanity, or care more to make points against the Government than to help the war. A large amount of energy is wasted in answering frivolous questions; and the authority of Ministers is weakened if they are exposed to a running fire of criticism which it is impossible for them to answer effectively without betraying military secrets to the enemy. What is needed above all things is moral concentration upon the one end, inspired by strong and glowing faith in the goodness of our cause. It is that which makes all our sacrifices worth while. It matters not how much we may have to suffer individually in body and soul, if only the right wins and justice is triumphant.

IT is this virtue of moral concentration which we have felt it our duty to try to encourage in every possible way. There are people who think that they may begin to scatter their energies. The whole subject of the war has become a little stale with custom. They confess that they are growing tired of it. It drags along on its slow miserable course, and there is so little that they can do except to think about it and make themselves unhappy. We protest that this is neither a gallant nor a faithful mood. The war is no mere episode in our well-ordered lives. Let us translate it into human terms, and it comes to us as an appeal from the suffering and oppressed which never ceases day or night. Do we want for one moment to close our ears to that cry? As we weigh it in the scales of imagination we see it big with the issues of virtue and happiness, of justice and freedom, for all the generations that come after us. Are we tired of the high concentration of thought and effort by which alone we can be creators of that better future, perhaps not for ourselves, but for our children's children? It is just this capacity of spending ourselves without stint for the unborn centuries which separates the spiritual man, with his vision of God, from the merely sensual, who clamours for his own safety and comfort.

WE fear from the mild rebuke of a correspondent that we did not make our own position sufficiently clear in our comments last week upon Prof. Morgan's position in regard to reprisals. We wanted to give its due weight to an argument, which was free from the vice of vindictiveness and at the same time was based upon a much closer knowledge of the ordinary German mind than most of us can claim to possess. But we do not agree with it, though we differ with respect. We are quite sure that any acceptance on our part of the policy of "frightfulness" would be wrong, and we must guard ourselves sternly against it, however terrible the provocation may happen to be. Nothing could be more demoralising than a competition in horrors. The use of our aircraft for serious military operations is an entirely different thing from sending them out to cruise in the dark with instructions to destroy something. We are glad that the Lord Chancellor spoke as plainly as he did on this subject a few days ago. It shows that moral considerations are paramount in the counsels of the Government in dealing with matters of this kind, and that is an incalculable source of strength in our relations with neutral countries and for the maintenance of our own self-respect.

A TABLET in memory of Florence Nightingale was unveiled by the Queen in the crypt of St. Paul's last week. The untold multitude of women engaged in nursing at the present moment are the best commentary upon her work. In the course of a short address the Archbishop of Canterbury referred specially to the qualities in her character which made her a successful pioneer.

> For half a century [he said] we have thanked God for what Florence Nightingale has wrought and taught, but we did not know its range or its greatness until now. So it is fitting that your Majesty, on behalf of English womanhood, should unveil this monument in a year when, in the nation's need, tens of thousands of women are, with persistency of quiet devotion and a ministry of steadily increasing skill, following the path wherein "the lady with the lamp" was pioneer. It is easy, or rather, it is not easy, to measure what the difference might have been had that pioneer been a woman of unbalanced enthusiasm, however eager, or of mere plodding devotion, however praiseworthy. The lead she gave might easily have been discredited, and, therefore, fruitless of result. But when to a buoyant faith, a courageous hope, and a large love, were super-added the gifts of penetrating judgment, of potent personal influence, and of almost unrivalled administrative skill, the fruitfulness of the leadership was immediately secure. England, and through England, the whole world, know now to a degree they never knew before, in camp and hospital, on land and sea, the priceless value of the gentle deftness and the tender skill of trained womanhood, both in peace time and when the horrors of war are at their worst.

WE are sure that restraint is needed on our part in dealing with the various difficulties in which America finds herself involved with Germany. There are no short cuts in politics, because politics belong to the difficult art of managing human relationships. Moreover, if we wish to preserve any power of independent judgment we had better pay little attention to the mass of contradictory reports and alarmist rumours which form the stock-in-trade of the newspaper correspondent at the present time. President Wilson is entitled to be judged by his official acts and not by what other people expect him to do. May we, however, venture simply to whisper that it would be grateful to English ears if he would occasionally speak a little more enthusiastically of the ties which bind American institutions and ideals to the parent stock. It would add strength, not to our arms, but to the moral ideals for which we stand, if a little more were made of this deep community of interest. We know that many of the noblest elements in American life feel this as deeply as we do. They recognise, as we on our part are eager to do, that political neutrality is compatible with a far-reaching moral alliance. It is in this alliance, which no political opportunism should be allowed to weaken, that we have the best guarantee for the future liberties of the world.

EVERY scrap of news from a neutral country which shows that the struggle is being watched with a keen perception of the moral issues involved, is welcome at the present time. The following is an extract from a letter just received from a Correspondent of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Denmark:—

> "I cannot send you a letter without speaking about what is on our mind by night and by day. It is not of the horror, sorrow, and suffering which stares us in the face and weighs on our mind every waking hour, that I am thinking. No, I am thinking of you and your Allies' heroic effort to deliver Europe—Germany included—from the evil spirit of Prussia, from the rule of the diabolic principle that Might is Right. I feel it as a privilege that I should live to see the day when this gigantic rise took place, when the higher spiritual ideals broke through the piles of materialism and selfishness that have been left to accumulate themselves for so long. No one can really wish for peace till the end is attained, till Europe is turned into the right path, seeking first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness."

IT is with special pleasure that we call attention to the letter by our venerable friend and correspondent, Mr. E. C. Harding, which appears in another column. With beautiful generosity he has devoted the evening of a life, which has been given without stint to the service of others, to raising funds to help the Serbian wounded. He wants to celebrate his 93rd birthday on February 23—next Wednesday—by completing £500, and he is about £30 short. His numerous friends among our readers can enable him to gratify this gracious wish if they will send him half-crowns at once as a birthday greeting. He writes to us that his hopes of succeeding are increased by the following letter which he has received from the Prime Minister:—

> 10, Downing Street,
> Whitehall, S.W.
> February 11, 1916.
> DEAR SIR,—I have had my attention drawn to the fund which you have raised for the relief of distress in Serbia, and I wish to offer you my congratulations on the success which has attended your efforts.
> Yours faithfully,
> H. H. ASQUITH.

THE REVIVAL OF RELIGION.

All men who take life seriously at the present time, are anxious for a revival of religion. They may not call it by that name, but they recognise that the supreme need is that of moral and spiritual power dwelling in their hearts, lifting them above sordid cares and mean aims, and welding them into a fellowship of goodness. They would also probably agree that this need is not one which can be safely neglected or left to the influence of casual reading or the ordinary services of the church. They cannot dismiss it with a shrug of the shoulders as the business of the clergy. It is a national and human concern. It must be studied intelligently, and with minds that are open to the significance of new impressions and the urgency of strange duties. If good men remain outside the church and refuse to accept her sacraments, they can no longer be treated as careless or unspiritual, for they have shown that they have in them the stuff of which heroes are made, and are engaged at the present moment in the Christ-like work of laying down their lives for their friends.

There is little evidence that all this has sunk very deeply into the consciousness of the churches of the country. With the usual professional instinct they are convinced that it is their business to train and mould this mighty tide of new experience instead of themselves being taught by it. They are paying the penalty of their artificial quietness amid the swelling of the sea. It is hard to believe, while we still pursue our decorous habits, that at the present moment we are actors in a movement more significant for human life than the French Revolution or the Reformation, or it may be than the crumbling of the mighty Roman Empire itself. But to those who realise this fact it seems incredible that religion, after it has been a little chastened, will remain in the forms of its thought and the manner of its worship essentially the same. Already there are signs of grave disappointment in many quarters because the flutter of religious excitement which accompanied our first stern grapple with duty and sorrow has passed away. The duty is not less terrible and sorrow has been multiplied a hundredfold, but men are not pressing into the churches to seek for strength and consolation. Is there not going to be any religious revival after all?

Many people are pricked by this question into fresh activity. The Church of England is organising its national mission of penitence and hope. Other churches clamour for some overhauling of their old-fashioned machinery, or, perhaps, fondly believe that they have at last found a panacea for turning indifference into earnestness. We do not undervalue these efforts. We wish them the richest success. We believe that it is our duty to employ every means of religious influence which lies ready to our hand, and to maintain all our habits of piety, until, perchance, some of them may be transformed into a richer expression of the soul's need. But how will it be, when we have done our utmost in these familiar ways, if there is no startling success to record, and the mass of men, whom we have learned to admire in these last few months for their courage and loyalty and high-mindedness, still show no inclination to accept our particular form of public worship or to interpret what is deepest in their own life in the terms of our traditional creeds? It is clear that we cannot dismiss this question as either frivolous or lacking in faith. Many men who keep their eyes wide open to what is taking place around them confess that something of the kind is very likely to happen. What then? Shall we be back in the old antagonism between a professional church and a hostile world? Or will the church have the humility to acknowledge that perhaps the religious revival has come not within its own borders but beyond them, and that outside its fenced enclosures there is a new spiritual kingdom, whose life it must appropriate and understand or perish in the attempt?

It was far-reaching considerations of this kind that we had in mind when we wrote last week that it is for us to wait patiently for God and not to prejudge the awful revealing of his purpose. There are disquieting symptoms of a failure on the part of men who value for themselves the peace and sanctity of an ordered church life to understand how other people can possibly be good without it. Chaplains at the Front confess that danger and death make men serious and unselfish, but they do not necessarily bring them to Communion or enable them to express what are usually known as religious feelings. If the churches are content to assume that this great mass of tried and tested manhood will be absorbed by them after the war, we fear that they are preparing bitter disappointment for themselves. And if it remains outside, they will no longer be able to pretend even to themselves that they have any monopoly of the religion which makes men brave and true-hearted. For some of us there may be no revival because we are blind to the strange manner of its appearing, and long habit has led us to attach more importance to our own forms and ceremonies than to the essential spirit of love and sacrifice. We venture to commend to the attention of our readers the warning contained in the following passage. It is taken from the current number of The Modern Churchman:—

> If the Church is to succeed in her task she must depend not on rhetorical and conventional religious appeals, but on the personal ascendance of her representatives—their spiritual, moral, and intellectual powers. Moreover, these representatives—and they consist of the great body of the clergy—will have to understand something more than they do at present of that most difficult of all things—the psychology of the manhood of England, and strive to work through it.

We have, we know, merely stated a problem, but it is an urgent one, and we cannot too early make up our minds that it will not solve itself, if we are content to turn a blind eye to it and go on attending to our own affairs. It requires all the intelligence, the spiritual imagination and the largeness of heart at our command, and a willingness to try unknown paths, if in doing so we are following the light of duty and faith. One more word we must add in order to guard against possible misunderstanding. Do not let any one suppose because we write in this way that we undervalue the spiritual truths of Christianity, or have any doubt of their supremacy.

Sacrifice, charity, and the grace of God which heals the sorrows of the world, these things mean tenfold more to us than they did in the untroubled days which now seem so far away. They are in a deeper sense than ever before the fountain light of all our seeing. But we cannot say that there is only one way of sacrament or ritual in which they can be quickened. When they are alive in the hearts of men, there on the battle-field and here in thousands of English homes, it is not a matter of the first importance that the forms in which they enshrine their beauty and immortal power should follow the traditional pattern and prescription. Who of us will dare to say that the life of religion—the soul's trust in God and its need of human fellowship—has lost its ancient power of carving out fresh channels for itself?

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

DEATH AND VICTORY.

He wept, he wept: there came a wind
Out of the cloud heavy and blind:
The angel of human thoughts had joy—
And water dropped from the cloud's hair,
The sun shone on the green leaves fair,
The wood-side sparkled everywhere.

He moaned: great pain weighed down his eyes;
His knees were bent, thick came his sighs:
The angel of human wounds had joy—
The sad earth was bemired with rain,
The ditches rose and stormed the plain,
The eddying wind blew round again.

He died: his head to earth was bowed,
Then sudden lifted to the cloud:
The angel of broken wings had joy—
The sun grew strong in the thick air,
The rainbow fled; half heaven was bare,
The storm went off with wings aflare.

R. W. Dixon.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth. And in Jesus Christ, His best son, our Master, who was born to show us the way through suffering to be also His sons and His daughters, His handmen and His handmaidens, who lived in the same spirit with the Father, that we may also live in that Holy Spirit whose meat was to do His Father's will and to finish His work, who suffered and died saying, "That the world may love the Father." And I believe in the Father Almighty's love and friendship, in the service of man being the service of God, the growing into a likeness with Him by love, the being one with Him in will at last, which is Heaven. I believe in the plan of Almighty Perfection to make us all perfect. And thus I believe in the Life everlasting.

Florence Nightingale.

Almighty and most merciful Father, in Whom we live and move and have our being, to Whose tender compassion we owe our safety in days past, together with all the comforts of this present life, and the hopes of that which is to come, we praise Thee, O God, our Creator; unto Thee do we give thanks, O God, our exceeding joy, Who daily pourest Thy benefits upon us. Grant, we beseech Thee, that Jesus our Lord, the hope of glory, may be formed in us, in all humility, meekness, patience, contentedness, and absolute surrender of our souls and bodies to Thy holy will and pleasure. Leave us not, nor forsake us, O Father, but conduct us safe through all changes of our condition here, in an unchangeable love to Thee, and in holy tranquillity of mind in Thy love to us, till we come to dwell with Thee, and rejoice in Thee for ever. Amen.

DR. DANIEL WILLIAMS AND HIS TRUST.

On January 26, 1716, there died at his house at Hoxton, "near London," as it was then described, the Rev. Daniel Williams, D.D., a leader amongst the Nonconformists of that time. Two centuries is a long period for fame to cover, and of those who were contemporary with Dr. Williams, Nonconformist ministers of London or the country, few have left more than a name to remind posterity of their existence. The student reads of them, perhaps reads their works; but to those who are not students they are virtually unknown.

Dr. Williams has not met with that fate, though it may be that not many people know much about him, or could say who he was or what he did. But he left a charitable foundation which is administered to-day on much the same lines as those which he laid down, and has been administered without a break from the time when the first Trustees under his will were in a position to carry out his directions. Benefits have been conferred upon hundreds and even thousands of persons up and down the country as the result of the trusts which he set up by his will, and also as the result of the diligence and faithfulness of successive generations of Trustees from the beginning even until now. Many have heard of "Dr. Williams's Library," though they may not have used it. Many have heard of "Dr. Williams's Scholarships." Many ministers have books on their shelves which were the gift of "Dr. Williams's Trustees," and many poor ministers and widows know the name which has been associated with help in their dire need.

While, therefore, there is less call to rescue from oblivion the name of Dr. Williams than there would be in the case of some of his contemporaries, seeing that he has left so varied a memorial, it is all the more fitting to speak of him by way of reminder to that posterity which owes so much to him, and to commemorate in this way the completion of two hundred years of work devoted to the objects which he appointed.

Of the life history of Dr. Williams I shall say but little. Not very much, indeed, is known, at all events, of the events of his early years. He was born at Wrexham in 1643 or 1644, and although he was thus too young to be one of the ejected ministers of 1662, he showed a courage worthy of them by beginning to preach in or about that same year. After ministering for a while in the neighbourhood of Wrexham he removed to Dublin, where he stayed for nearly twenty years. In 1687 he came to London. In the following year he was appointed minister of the congregation in Hand Alley, and he died holding that office in 1716. He took a leading part in the affairs of the Nonconformists, both political and controversial, and his influence was probably increased by the fact that he was rich. He appears to have used his wealth during his life for the same ends as those to which he bequeathed it after his death, the helping of his Nonconformist brethren, either as individuals or collectively. It is curious to reflect how little remains of the political, controversial, and ministerial work to which he devoted his time, and how much of the quiet charities that were done unseen. He lived through the dangerous times when the enemies of the Dissenters had the sovereign on their side, and nearly succeeded in undoing what the Toleration Act had done. He must have fought in many a battle of those days, but the last echo of them has long ago died away. He was to the fore in the theological strife of that period, and his published works of divinity may still be read by the curious and the patient. He provided that they should be reprinted every twentieth year for 2,000 years; one of the few provisions of his will which is no longer operative. But Nonconformity to-day reaps the fruits of what he did as a political fighter in his time; and of his writings by far the most interesting is his last will. Its importance lies, of course, mainly in the fact that it sets up the various charitable trusts which have been, and still are, so fruitful of good. But it is interesting as a human document, throwing light upon the character of the man whose purpose it expresses. It is said that he drew it up himself, and it is remarkable for the combination of far-seeing prudence, broad human sympathy, wise charity, and strong grasp of practical details. He must have been a rare man of business, or else have had the good fortune to be well served in the management of his many estates. The present writer has been through all the deeds relating to the various properties which gradually came into the possession of Dr. Williams, and he has a whole-hearted admiration for him as a practical man.

The provisions of the will are many and various, but the general intention is not difficult to understand. After providing for those immediately dependent on him, and for various friends by name, he made bequests to the College of Glasgow, the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge in Scotland, and a Society in New England, and then left all the freehold and inheritance of all his estates not otherwise disposed of in such a way that twenty-three Trustees mentioned by name should stand possessed of them for a term of two thousand years, and should apply the income for certain purposes. Particular care was taken to guard against any diversion of the trust in the interest of the Church of England or the Roman Catholic Church. The income of the Trust was to be applied in maintaining schools, or rather in paying teachers, in the distribution of "Bibles, catechisms, and good practical books" to the poor, in grants of money to the widows of ministers and also to ministers themselves, in binding apprentices, in the training of students for the ministry, and in maintaining "Educated persons of sound judgment and sober principles to preach the word of God in Wales." Towards the end of the will the Library is mentioned. After "duplicate and useless books and unfit to be set in a public library" have been removed or given away, the residue is to be set apart for a public library, and a suitable room provided for it, with some one to be in charge of it. No provision is made for the increase of the library by the purchase of books, though the testator evidently hoped that donations would be made to the library from time to time.

The foregoing summary makes no pretence to be a full description of the contents of this long and very carefully drawn document; but the last clause of the will deserves to be given verbatim. It runs as follows:—

"I beseech the blessed God, for Christ Jesus' sake the head of his church (whose I am and whom I desire to serve) that this my will may by his blessing and power reach its end and be faithfully executed. Obtesting in the name of this great and righteous God all that are or shall be concerned that what I design for his glory and the good of mankind may be honestly, prudently and diligently employed to those ends; as I have to the best of my judgment directed by this my last testament."

The will was dated June 26, 1711. When it was examined after Dr. Williams's death, it was found that he had added a codicil which was not witnessed, as well as several interlinear alterations. Some litigation was necessary before the Trustees were enabled, under a decree of the Court of Chancery, to begin to carry out the several trusts. For more than one hundred and forty years the Trustees administered the Trust under the direction of the Court of Chancery. At the present day they do so on the lines of a scheme approved by the Charity Commissioners, as will be explained subsequently.

The reader will have gathered from the above account of the will the main intention and scope of the charitable trust which it sets up. I shall reserve till later a more particular account of the way in which the Trust is worked, because what is true of it to-day is substantially true of it when it was founded. I go on to mention some incidental features of the Trust which are in place in an account of its foundation.

The earliest Trustees interpreted in a generous sense the direction to provide a place for the books: "a throwster's workhouse or the like," was the testator's own thrifty suggestion. They built on a site in Red Cross Street, a plain and substantial brick house, with ample space for the books, and rooms for the Trustees and others to meet. The building was pulled down to make way for railway extension in or about 1864, but prints are extant which show both the exterior and the interior. This building became the headquarters of the Three Denominations for a century, the regular meeting place for those who directed the policy of Nonconformity. And here from about the year 1742 was kept the famous register of baptisms amongst the Dissenters, not of London only, but of the whole country. I found recently amongst some old papers the original instructions drawn up for the first librarian, and the last of them is that he shall keep a register of the kind described. It is also required that the librarian shall be a bachelor—a provision upon which later Trustees have not thought it necessary to insist.

The library building was the official home of the Trust where anything connected with it found a natural place. Various relics are still in the possession, and some even in the daily use of the Trust, which date from the foundation of the Library, and, in some instances, are said to have belonged to Dr. Williams himself. Some fine pieces of mahogany furniture came, according to tradition, from the Hoxton house. The tall clock now in the reading-room was made by a man who was just starting in business when the Library was built, and did not belong to Dr. Williams himself. I found a while ago a silver cup with the initials, D. W., and believed this to have been his; but I have been assured by an expert that it is of much later date.

There seems to have been an idea in the minds of the first Trustees that the Library might become a museum of curiosities, for several donations were made of interesting and valuable objects which are still among the possessions of the Trust. One of them is a plain glass bowl, said to have been used at the baptism of Queen Elizabeth, and which may well have served as the lining for some gold or silver vessel used as a font. There is an Egyptian mummy, which my colleague, who will write about the contents of the Library, recently discovered to have been presented by Dr. Calamy, one of the first Trustees. The book in which that is recorded is the original benefaction book begun in 1729. It was lost after the last removal of the Library, and only found about a year ago in clearing out a lumber room. Amongst some other lumber was found lately an old barometer which belonged to the original Library, and it has now been repaired and brought into use. All these are curiosities in their own way, and also indications of the way in which the Library was regarded by those who established and continued it. It began by being the collection of books of a learned and large-minded minister, and the home which contained it gathered such accessories of learned interest as that minister might have done. Even now, though the number of volumes is far larger than at the beginning, the Library keeps something of its original character, and finds its old treasures in no way out of keeping with its present aims and activities.

Amidst such surroundings, and in such a mental atmosphere, the work of the Trust has been carried on during two hundred years. In another article I shall give an account of what is done at the present day to carry out the intentions of the founder. Two articles, by the sub-Librarian, Mr. S. K. Jones, will deal with the contents of the Library.

THE FREE CATHOLIC POSITION.

To the Editor of The Inquirer

Sir,—Mr. John C. Warren has given a list of dreadful things which he supposes "tend to the disintegration of our body." He includes amongst them "baptising in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." If this tends to disintegration it has been a long time about it. Ever since there were Unitarian Christians this has been the usual form. Perhaps I may venture to remind Mr. John C. Warren that even in our loose-jointed body the minister is not left entirely to his private whims and conceits in celebrating this solemn Christian rite. There are manuals for the guidance of those who are not so conceited as to suppose they have long outgrown the teaching of the New Testament. One of the most authoritative of these is the 'Common Prayer for Christian Worship,' which says in the Baptism for Infants, "And naming the child, he shall apply the water in the usual way saying: 'I baptise thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.'" There is, it is true, an alternative, the infant may be baptised in the name of Jesus Christ only, or "dedicated to the Kingdom of God through his Son Jesus Christ," or "to God in the name of Jesus Christ." For my part I have always preferred to use the first form, which has not only the warrant of Scripture, but of the whole Church of Christ. For in this matter the visible Church is really Catholic. This baptism is accepted as valid by the whole Church. And this must be considered in its effect on the future of the child. I do not think the ceremony should be so administered that under possible eventualities it would have to be done over again simply through the omission of a Scriptural phrase. When the ministrant is authorised to open to the infant the door of the whole Christian Church I do not think he should merely admit it through the wicket of a sect. But, however that may be, if Mr. John C. Warren supposes that baptism "has tended to the disintegration of our body," I can assure him that thirty years' active ministerial experience in Ireland and this country flatly contradicts so absurd a notion. The very opposite is true, and I have found that deplorable disintegration may be traced mainly to the neglect of Christian baptism.—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Mr. Lloyd Thomas divides his critics into three sections, those in active sympathy, those who are benevolently neutral, and those who hold an attitude of supercilious superiority. Is it a part of the mental attitude of the Free Catholic so to stigmatise all those who disagree with him? A Unitarian would consider it a part of his mental equipment to credit his opponents with earnestness of purpose and sincerity of belief as a matter of course, until the opposite were proved. I hope no Unitarian fails to concede so much to Mr. Lloyd Thomas, deeply though they may disagree with him. Certainly, none would willingly exchange with him his conception of the mentality of his opponents.—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your correspondent C. H. Morgan, misquotes me. My words as to the inalienable connection of the word Catholic with a definite religious body were "with the church in communion with the Pope." I did not in this connection mention infallibility. So we are really at one on this point. I should be grateful, however, if you would permit me to enlarge on this matter of the use, or rather abuse, of the word Catholic. From very early times this title was used to distinguish the Churches in communion with Rome from heretical and schismatical bodies. Tertullian (A.D. 220), De Præscript xxx. uses it in this sense, likewise the Muratorian fragment (circa 180 A.D.), St. Clement of Alexandria (circa 215 A.D.), Stromata vii. 17, Pacian (circa 370), Ep. i. ad Sempron., St. Cyprian (circa 252 A.D.), St. Cyril of Jerusalem (circa 347 A.D.), in Section 26 of his Catechetical discourses, and so on. I might refer to innumerable instances; but the most apposite is St. Augustine who, in his 'De verâ religione,' xii., says, "Whether they wish or no heretics have to call the Catholic Church Catholic," and more pointedly in 'Contra Epistolam quam vocant Fundamenti iv.,' "Although all heretics wish to be styled Catholics, yet if any one ask where is the Catholic place of worship none of them would venture to point out his own conventicle." Could anything be truer to this very day? And remember this was written in the fourth century against the Donatists. Where are they now?

One word on the letter of the Rev. H. H. Johnson, who asks, "Is it not conceivable" that we, in common with Mr. Joseph McCabe, may find ethical values in the Church (of Rome I suppose)? Undoubtedly! But I see very poor ethics in starting by stealing her name. It seems to me that it is doctrines and ceremonies that the soi-disant Free Catholics want to borrow from the Catholic Church rather than ethics. I yield to no one in my profound respect for the Catholic Church and the means she supplies for the sanctification of her children, but these are contingent on the acceptance of her authority—the sanctity is the outcome of the faith—which Unitarians, presumably, have not, otherwise why remain outside? To me such movements as the Free Catholic and the Anglo-Catholic are confessions of failure, and when an individual has arrived at this stage I feel sure that ultimately he will find his true peace, not in makeshifts for Catholicity or plausible imitations, but only in the bosom of the real Catholic Church. I am not surprised at such movements, for I have had experience of the difficulty and hardship of "ploughing the lonely furrow" in matters of religion.—Yours, &c.

THE SERIOUSNESS OF LIFE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—As one brought up under the same traditions as Miss Dorothea Hollins, may I add one other thought to her extremely helpful words. The religious atmosphere which she describes is one that cannot fail to stimulate and strengthen character. The faith that is able to bring about this stedfast conviction stands justified whatever the creed or denomination. The realisation that the worshippers around us are sincere believers in the faith they are professing, and would give their lives for it, this, and this alone, gives us true religion and with it peace of mind. But is not the thought of the seriousness of life inseparably bound up with such a faith? Is it not this thought that has been lacking during the last generation and that is being brought back into our midst to-day? Life and death have come home to us all in a new way. This has made the people think seriously, and they are willing and anxious to express this seriousness in religious devotion. Who can say what is the actual cause of religious aspiration? I believe that the world contains people of two opposite tendencies. Those who have in themselves the thought of the serious nature of life (nurtured by their own everyday impressions and experiences) and who wish to express such thoughts in the terms of religion. Others in whom the religious symbol (which appeals to the eye, ear, or brain) awakens the thought of the seriousness of life. I would make no comparisons between these two natures, or place one higher and the other lower. I believe our intellectual blunder has been that we have failed to distinguish and differentiate between these two opposite natures. This question, however, is a metaphysical and scientific one; and it is in these realms that we may hope to see some startling corroboration of such a theory. From the religious point of view we must take both natures and, while educating them by different methods, achieve in the end the same result, the strengthening and development of character by means of the steady focusing of the mind on large realities. Also by means of indicating and taking a distinct lead along true lines of life.

It is on this last head that we must lay emphasis to-day. The church is needed to put forward some real lead by demonstrating some definite line of life in harmony with Christian principles.

If it has felt it to be compatible with its principles to fiercely combat, even unto death, wanton cruelty to women and children, let it show itself equally fiercely angry at the infant mortality caused by wanton greed in ownership of property. Let it deal cuttingly with the white slave traffic. Let it lead the young men and women in actual crusades for the benefit of the weak and suffering. The young people will gladly follow. Let the religious world form centres where the actual work of life is carried on in harmony with reality (I do not refer to missions where attempts are made to alleviate the devastations made by un-Christian living and trading). Let the Church bring the beauty of holiness and the grace of love home to the people by means of encouraging interest in public management, by violently opposing un-Christian tricks of business. Let it lead the people in cutting itself off from all selfish, mean, frivolous methods of living. Let it act towards all these evils with the same ruthless slaughter that has been shown towards the enemy. Then a sincere Church will arise, and the young men and women will be as eager (after the attack) to come into the quiet church and worship (amid all the accessories of beauty) and meditate on truth and holiness, as the young soldiers are to-day to come into the quiet atmosphere of prayer after they have fought their good fight on the battlefield.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

FRANCISCAN POVERTY.

The Romanticism of St. Francis. By Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 6*s.* 6*d.* net.

Readers of Father Cuthbert's 'Life of St. Francis' will be eager to turn to this new volume of essays; and they will not be disappointed, for it displays the same combination, as rare as it is beautiful, of the ripe gifts of the scholar with deep religious reverence and a childlike delight in simple things. It contains four essays, the 'Romanticism of St. Francis,' 'St. Clare of Assisi,' the 'Story of the Friars,' and a 'Modern Friar,'—the last an affectionate tribute to the memory of the renowned mission preacher, Father Alphonsus, who died in 1911. Of these, the first, which gives its title to the book, is the most important. It is an illuminating study in religious interpretation. Father Cuthbert is not only a Franciscan by profession, he is a Franciscan in heart, and the spirit which breathes through the Fioretti has found in him a joyous and ardent disciple. To the modern man, whose whole life is dominated by commercial standards, poverty is only a negative conception, and voluntary poverty seems the height of madness. Until we get rid of this belief, and also dismiss from our minds the idea that the ascetic ideal as embraced by St. Francis involves the cultivation of squalor and unhappiness as in themselves virtuous, we shall be unable to approach the lives of the early Franciscans with sympathy or to understand the literature and art which they have bequeathed to us. "They did not become poor," Father Cuthbert writes of them, "from a morbid clinging to discomfort; not even in order to inflict discomfort on others. They embraced poverty because it held for them a comfort and joy in this life, and the promise of yet a greater in the next. Poverty to them was at once a promise and possession of life, not its negation. Even now, and upon the earth it brought them joy." It is admitted that society would be dissolved if all men followed their example, but this does not militate against the fact that for some it is a divine calling, the chosen method by which their lives are to be enriched and made capable of exerting an uplifting influence upon the common life of the world. "Others before Francis had shown how wealth and property can be an instrument for the upbuilding of Christian character and Christian society. It was Francis who most clearly convinced men that poverty, too, may be a factor in moral and spiritual development." It is this large-hearted sympathy with the varieties of human duty combined with his fervent attachment to his own chosen path, which makes Father Cuthbert's whole treatment so illuminating. On a subject, which tempts most writers to faults of over-emphasis, he attracts us by a simplicity and cheerfulness, which leave no doubt that he is writing out of his own heart and not simply defending the rule of his Order. Indeed, he has scant sympathy with the life of mere obedience, which has in it none of the freedom of living Christian affections, as the following words will show:—

"Most of the reform movements in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries set out with the professed purpose of bringing back the Church to the poverty of Christ: but in practice at least they worshipped the poverty more than the Christ; and by consequence their gospel was legal and political rather than human and spiritual. With them evangelical poverty was at best a mere moral code and at its worst a bitter political cry. But with St. Francis it was altogether different. He took poverty to himself as one takes a personal joy. He can hardly be said to have regarded it as a discipline, certainly not as a mere external programme. With perfect reason he spoke of it as 'Lady Poverty,' since to him it was as a free spirit resplendent with human and God-like qualities by virtue of its alliance with Jesus Christ the Mirror of all human and Divine perfection. Francis's supreme worship went out to that personal perfection of life which he saw incarnate in his Divine Lord, and he worshipped poverty only because it was the keeper of his affection for that far-off desired perfection."

This passage goes to the root of the matter so far as St. Francis was concerned, though it may be open to debate whether it is quite fair to the movements of poverty, which had upon them the brand of heresy. They and the religious motives which underlay their teaching, and the extraordinary appeal which they made to the mediæval mind, can hardly be dismissed in this way as lacking in nobility and power. Is it not fairer, from the historical point of view, to see in them the groping of sound religious instincts, it is true along strange and often hazardous paths of conduct and speculation, after that closer imitation of the poor Christ, which has been illuminated for all time by the spiritual genius of St. Francis?

The Faith and the War. Edited by F. J. Foakes-Jackson, D.D. London: Macmillan & Co. 5*s.* net.

This volume is described as "a series of essays by members of the Churchmen's Union and others on the religious difficulties aroused by the present condition of the world." Among the contributors are Prof. Percy Gardner, Miss Alice Gardner, Canon Rashdall, the Dean of St. Paul's, Prof. A. E. Taylor, the Rev. E. A. Burroughs, Canon Glazebrook and the Dean of Durham. Names of this distinction are a sufficient guarantee that the difficult problems with which they deal are handled with elevation of thought and feeling. There is no tendency to dismiss them with an emotional appeal and a traditional answer. The essays are full of real thinking and animated by a desire "to help those whose hearts are failing amid the dangers and perplexities of the present world crisis." Accordingly the book may be recommended as among the best of its kind. It provides stimulus and guidance for those who are inclnied to sit down and think the whole thing out. It may be doubted, however, whether it will carry most of us very far, for the simple reason that what we need at the moment is not a philosophical explanation or a theory of the universe but moral power and readiness to serve. Through sorrow and disillusionment and bitterness of soul, through heroism and the highest forms of sacrifice, the floodgates of experience have been opened in our lives. The voice that comes to us out of the whirlwind is a demand for obedience. It comes to peasant and philosopher alike, just because they are men; and it is only when we have borne the yoke, when the danger is past and the duty done, that we shall be able to return to the quiet tasks of philosophical reflection. In other words we must allow the new experience to teach us before we attempt to detach ourselves sufficiently from it to make it the subject-matter of our own teaching and explanations. No doubt here in England there has been less upheaval than elsewhere, and consequently many men have still time and opportunity to parley with their difficulties and even hope to ease them by discussion. Let them do it, however, with these words of Mr. Burroughs continually in mind—they strike us as among the wisest which these essays contain—"It is not surprising, but supremely natural, that it is at the front, in the thick of the horror, but in the heart also of the sacrifice, that men are feeling after and grasping their God, while we at home, with the old sceptical atmosphere still clinging around us, profess to find in the echo of the same events so much reinforcement for our doubts."

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN.

THE International Union publishes, in its Report of Affiliated Societies and of the Correspondence Bureau, covering a period of fourteen months to last October, some interesting details of its activities since the war began. Much of its work, of course, came to an end for the time being on the outbreak of hostilities, but it was not long before the English Secretary, Miss Brooke Herford, discovered that the machinery of the Union could still be put to use on behalf of those, both in enemy countries and in England, who were anxious for tidings of friends and relatives which could no longer be obtained in the ordinary way. The Correspondence Bureau, full details of the working of which have been given in our columns, was started in London in September, 1914, with Miss Van Eck of Leiden, President of the Fellowship Guild, as the connecting link between the English International Committee on the one hand, and the German society, represented by Fräulein Barth, on the other. It has done excellent work, the results of which may bear fruit in the time to come, for, to quote the Report, "Those who carry it on are at one in feeling that they owe more to it than it can ever owe to them, for the glimpse it has given them into so many deeds of goodness and love performed by so-called enemies." The English Secretary has now 350 correspondents on her list, and on the books of the Dutch agent there are 606 such correspondents. During the year 1,500 letters and cards have passed through Miss Van Eck's hands, and she has sent 70 telegrams, and postal orders innumerable. Sometimes as many as fifteen letters have to be written to ensure the successful transmission of one letter, and occasionally the difficulties in the way of forwarding money have been very complicated, as in the case of an Austrian lieutenant imprisoned in Siberia. The money left Leiden as gulden, was sent to Copenhagen, where it became kronen, and reached the Siberian prison in the shape of roubles. For certain cases the funds of the International Union have been drawn upon, and help has been forthcoming, both from the American Women's Alliance and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. All the affiliated societies have co-operated in this work, with the exception of the Hungarian Women's Alliance, from which no report has been received; and the "Section Genevoise" of the Union has devoted itself specially to ministering to the crowds of refugees who have passed through Geneva, for whom food and clothing and rest were provided at the stations of that city.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Hastings.—The Annual Meeting of the Congregation of the Free Christian Church was held on Thursday evening, February 10. The minister (the Rev. E. Lockett) presided, and there was a good attendance of members and friends. Considering the times, satisfactory and encouraging reports were made of the Church's work during the past year. The Treasurer (Mr. H. G. Proctor), was able to announce a favourable balance on the accounts, and a good feature of the financial situation was the generous response made by the congregation to charitable appeals in connection with the war. For the relief of Belgians in Belgium alone, over £20 has been raised since last August. A Meeting and a Concert (organised by Mrs. Malcolm Brown), in aid of the Belgian Hospital Fund, have also been held. The activities of the Church Guild (which has been re-organised during the winter), had to be somewhat curtailed owing to lighting regulations. The Minister's Study Circle for Adults has been suspended, but the Young People's Class has been held as usual, and is meeting weekly. The monthly lectures have also been continued, and have on the whole been well attended. Besides local gentlemen, the following have given lectures: Revs. W. H. Drummond, S. Burrows and Frank K. Freeston; and the Rev. Joseph Wood will deliver the closing lecture next month. The Guild Secretary (Miss Viner), gave an interesting report concerning the different sections of the Guild's work, and the Treasurer (Mr. D. Pilcher), reported a small balance on the right side. Mrs. Measures made a statement for the Ladies' Sewing Circle, which has been active not only on behalf of the Church, but also in making garments for soldiers, sandbags, &c.

Hungary.—The Rev. Alexis Kiss, Ph.D., formerly a student at Manchester College, who returned to Hungary several months ago, is now married and settled as the minister of the Unitarian Church at Kissolymus, in the County of Udvarhelymagye. The Rev. F. Hankinson received a letter from Dr. Kiss, in which he expressed a wish to be very kindly remembered to his friends in England.

Liverpool: Ullet Road Church.—A most informing lecture was given at the meeting of the Rathbone Literary Society on Friday, February 11, by Mr. J. L. Paton, M.A., High Master of Manchester Grammar School. There was a very large attendance. Taking as his title 'Germany and the Germans,' Mr. Paton spoke as having from early youth and throughout life had an intimate connection with Germany. The knowledge gained in German homes, schools and universities had been made permanent by unceasing relations carried on up to the very outbreak of the war, and assisted by the system of exchange between English and German schoolmasters and boys which he had inaugurated in Manchester Grammar School. He spoke with admiration of that massive organisation, that solid energy and sense of duty, that patient and co-operative research which raised brilliant ideas and inventions borrowed from minds outside Germany to a high power of practical efficiency within, the orderliness into which the nation was drilled, the disciplining and inclusion of individualities in certain categories outside of which was no social salvation, the general well-being worked out, so to speak, in official laboratories and applied from outside. But he also showed what is now so patent to the world: the hideous defects which accompanied these qualities, the results of putting Germany into Prussian uniform, body and soul. In moderate and admirably lucid terms Mr. Paton drew a picture of the Prussianising of Germany and contrasted the Prussian ideal with that of other nations. He examined the Prussian systems of government, education, modern philosophy and religion, considered as factors in the multiplication of the powers of true living and the achievement of spiritual results. For forty years the Prussian creed has been sterilising the soul of Germany. The results are the cynical blood-lust, the grotesque megalomania, the outrages of the criminal "superman" on the hard-won ascensions of the human spirit, with which she confronts a universal horror to-day.

Poole.—The Rev. G. B. Stallworthy of Tunbridge Wells has accepted an invitation to the Unitarian Church in succession to the Rev. W. B. Matthews. He will begin his ministry on March 5.

London: Kentish Town.—Last Sunday evening a special Service was held in celebration of the completion of the Rev. Frederick Hankinson's tenth year of ministry there. A congregation of about 120 past and present members of the Church assembled. During the course of his address, Mr. Hankinson dwelt on the importance of standing together in the effort to build up a living church. At the conclusion he made reference to the poor state in which he found the Church and its institutions at his coming, and how by the hearty co-operation and devoted labours of the few who had remained faithful to the cause, they had been able to surmount their difficulties and re-establish a centre of usefulness and enlightenment in the neighbourhood. A choir of about twenty voices led the music, and the whole service was bright and inspiring. Mr. Hankinson is to be congratulated on the evident affection and esteem in which he is held by all those who are privileged to work with him.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

MR. SARGENT AND THE RED CROSS SOCIETY.

The packets of Red Cross stationery which will shortly be on sale at the modest price of one penny will enable the poorest in the land to contribute their mite towards the relief of the sick and wounded, and to become familiar with a powerful drawing by Mr. John S. Sargent, which is reproduced on each envelope. The latter represents a classical warrior with a short sword in his hand being helped from a stretcher by a womanly figure in flowing draperies, against the background of a Red Cross. The original sketch has been presented by the artist to the London Museum, and will certainly form one of the most unique memorials of the present time. More expensive issues of the envelopes will be available for those who can afford the better qualities, the prices ranging from 3*d.* to 10*s.*, and there will be a limited number of complete sets, with all the different values, for collectors. The idea originated with Mr. J. G. Joicy, one of the most active members of the Committee organising the Red Cross Sale at Christie's, and it is hoped that the stationery, which will be on sale in all booksellers' shops and stationers throughout the kingdom, will be purchased in great quantities. The notepaper, it should be added, will be varied, original designs by well-known artists appearing from time to time. Half a dozen or more will be among the first issues.

THE GARDEN CITY MOVEMENT.

The industries of Letchworth, according to the Annual Report of the First Garden City, Ltd., are in a flourishing condition, by no means solely on account of temporary munition work. Two important Belgian engineering works have been established in the town, employing 1,200 men, and the present population is approaching 12,000. Three thousand, it is true, are Belgians, but there is every prospect that the demand for houses, as a result of which some hundreds of new cottages have been erected by various housing societies and the Hitchin District Council, will continue for some time to come. The necessary Government loans towards this work were only granted after close inquiry into the urgent need for them. The net profit for the year was £5,823, an increase of £2,621 over the preceding year.

THE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

Mr. W. W. Wintle, Secretary of the Foundling Hospital, has just completed fifty years' work in connection with that institution, the occasion being marked by a presentation from the Governors. The work and methods of the hospital have not changed very much during the half century, but the buildings have been considerably enlarged, and now accommodate nearly 700 boys and girls. The income has grown enormously—a fact which it is cheering to reflect upon in these days when most charitable societies are suffering from a diminution of funds. Fifty years ago the ground rents for the thirty acres or more of land surrounding the hospital amounted to £6,000 a year. Since that time great changes have taken place in the neighbourhood, large blocks of flats cover the space once occupied by small houses, and the income from the estate has risen to about £30,000 a year. One old custom—that of "giving instruction"—has recently been abandoned. When a child was about to leave the hospital, it was the practice to bring him or her before the Committee to receive a parchment inscribed with a number of injunctions, phrased in quaint, old-fashioned language, as to moral behaviour. Six months ago the Committee decided that, if the child really understood the document, it might reasonably be thought offensive, and the rule was, therefore, abrogated. A simple "good-bye" is now substituted for this rather formidable ceremony.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

IT is with great pleasure that we call attention to the letter from the Sunday School Association which we publish to-day. The proposal that the scholars in our Sunday Schools should unite to present the Hut for rest and recreation, which the Belgian Hospital Fund is anxious to provide for the Belgian Army at an important centre in France, is one that meets with our warmest gratitude and approval. Nothing could be more appropriate than that those who are still happy and secure in their own homes should unite to help the homeless Belgian soldier who has fought so bravely and suffered so terribly in the common cause. It is another illustration of the way in which the work of the Fund is drawing us all together in our churches and schools all over the country. There is no bond of union so strong as that of generous love which devotes itself to the service of human suffering and need. In coming days there will be more religion in our hearts and more happiness in our worship because we have done this great and holy thing together.

WE shall soon be able to describe the whole plan more in detail. Mrs. Bernard Allen left for France on Monday on a long tour of inspection. There are many things which require personal attention, and, of course, every visit of this kind brings with it the priceless gift of sympathy and friendship. Among other things Mrs. Allen intends to visit the colonies of Belgian children to which we have already sent out a large amount of clothing, and to discuss the proposal for establishing a small hospital for their use. She will also have an opportunity of considering the plans for the erection and management of the Hut with the authorities on the spot. We feel that there must be no delay about putting the work in hand, as the need is so urgent. We have no doubt whatever that the money will be forthcoming.

EVERYBODY in the country will wish as earnestly as Mr. Snowden and Mr. C. P. Trevelyan that we were in a position to formulate acceptable terms of peace and send them forward to Germany. Their own speeches in the House of Commons on Wednesday are the best illustration of the futility of doing so at the present time. They amounted to little more than counsels of despair. To accept a position of stalemate, as Mr. Snowden apparently wished to do, would not be peace but appalling disaster for the world. It is just our love of peace as a supremely good and holy thing, when it is based upon justice and honourable dealing, which stiffens our resolve to prosecute the war with vigour. It has taken many people a long time to grasp the unwelcome truth that in the present condition of Europe there can be no peace except through successful conflict. But they understand it now. If they do not listen with much interest to Mr. Snowden and Mr. Trevelyan it is not because their minds are drugged by militarism or have lost the clearness of moral judgment, which all Christian men must desire to possess. It is because these untimely pleas for peace are condemned by facts, and they are equally condemned by conscience.

FROM the strictly political point of view it is difficult to see how there can be any advantage in stating our terms in greater detail than has been done in Mr. Asquith's famous declaration. It is a clear pronouncement of the principles of international equity and common security which must underlie any settlement. Until Germany accepts them as the basis of discussion there can be no agreement between us, and there seems little likelihood that she will undergo any change of heart except through the sharp discipline of poverty and disaster. The time is not ripe for the preparation of detailed proposals for redrawing the map of Europe and settling the future of the German colonies which have fallen into our hands. Not only would it scatter our energies upon discussions which, at the moment, can have small practical value; it would also tend to weaken the bonds of moral idealism among the Allies, which have already stood the shock of many disappointments and grown stronger month by month.

A CONFERENCE convened by the Temperance Council of the Christian Churches of England was held at Sion College on Tuesday under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury. It was resolved to request the Minister of Munitions to receive a deputation in order to call his attention to the need of a more stringent enforcement by magistrates and the police of the existing Licensing Laws and of the orders issued by the Central Control Board. All the speakers emphasised the deplorable extent to which excessive drinking still prevailed in the country. In spite of restrictions the sale of drink shows little decrease. General Booth pointed out that means of evasion were being rapidly contrived, and home drinking was undoubtedly on the increase, while Mr. St. Leo Strachey, whose campaign in The Spectator is worthy of all praise, emphasised the hardship involved in depriving newspapers of a third of their paper while the materials for making beer were left untouched. It is, however, very good news that distilleries are to be taken over as "controlled" establishments, as the spirit which they produce is required for the manufacture of explosives. This means that no more whisky will be produced for consumption till after the war. Unfortunately the stocks already in hand are said to be large.

A deputation of Russian authors and journalists is at present in this country as the guests of the Government. They have really come in order that they may be eye-witnesses to their own people of our effort. They speak with complete cheerfulness of the spirit which animates the whole of Russia; it has been chastened and ennobled by its misfortunes. It is intended that they shall make an extensive tour through our camps, munition-factories, and hospitals, in addition to the more ceremonial courtesies which have been extended to them. They have arrived at an auspicious moment, when fresh glory has come to the Russian arms, and the Tsar has for the first time opened the Duma in person. Immense work has to be done in providing channels of communication between the English and the Russian mind, and cultivating a temper of mutual understanding. If the struggle had been over quickly we should all have come out of it with the old barriers intact, still blinded by our own ignorance and prejudice. Our difficulties, our disappointments, all the burdens which we have had to bear together, have revealed us to one another. Paradoxical as it may appear, the prospects of international friendship are far brighter at the present moment than they were in the days before the war. The idealists and those who dream of the federation of the world are the last men who ought to despair.

The work of the Tribunals which have to deal with claims for exemption from military service, is exciting a good deal of public interest. It is natural that it should be so, for it brings the whole matter home to our business and bosoms. We hope that it is also doing something to intensify the feeling of the sacrifices which are required of us, and of the complete willingness with which we must make them for the sake of ends that are greater than our own comfort or welfare. There is a tendency in some quarters to regard those who succeed in obtaining exemption as lucky, as though we ought to be glad if we can find some way of escaping from disagreeable duties and leave them to be performed by others. National service at the present time is a privilege—that is the only right way of looking at it. There are many who cannot go, and are quite rightly excused, but if life is to be measured by the wealth of the service which it renders to others, it is not they but the boys in the trenches who are to be envied. The Tribunals are quite right not to make the path of exemption easy, and in such a course we believe they will have the full support of public opinion. We must never forget the thousands of men who volunteered in the first months of the war, quite reckless of their private interests. They also had family and business ties, with urgent claims upon them; but they were not held back by them, and they never asked to be excused.

The churches may be expected to take a special interest in the way in which the plea of conscientious objection is dealt with, as in many cases it will affect some of their own members. We recognise the difficulty of the situation, though we cannot agree that any man ought to be entirely exempted simply because he states that his conscience forbids him to have anything to do with the war. None of us can renounce the common duties and obligations of citizenship in that way unless we are prepared to emigrate to a desert island. It is, of course, impossible for any Tribunal to search out the secrets of conscience and test their validity, though all of us know that conscientious objection is a capacious umbrella which shelters a great variety of opinions, and all of them are by no means worthy of respect. On the whole, the policy which the Tribunals seem inclined to adopt, of refusing total exemption and putting the objector into some form of non-combatant service, seems to us the most satisfactory. It does the minimum of violence to any possible scruples of conscience, and at the same time it honours the just claim of society upon the help of every man who accepts the protection of its laws. The man whose objection is based upon deep and tested moral conviction will surely be eager to show his willingness to accept the hardest alternative that can be laid upon him. He knows that his own security is being purchased by the blood of other men. If his conscience forbids him to join them in the trenches he must find some other way, which will be at once a pledge of his own sincerity and an act of severe self-sacrifice for the common good.

An interim report entitled 'Towards Christian Unity' has just been issued by a Committee representing the Church of England and some of the leaders of the Free Churches. The purpose of the Committee has been to explore the ground of possible union among churches of different historical antecedents and to set them forth under the two heads of Faith and Order. Under a third heading they have grouped the differences in relation to matters of Order which require further study and discussion. As it stands the report is a singularly unattractive document. It bears in almost every line the impress of the thought and phraseology of the technical theologian. Union, apparently, is to be sought through dogmatic agreement and not along the deeper lines of spiritual apprehension and the common graces and affections of Christian discipleship. For attempts of this kind we cannot profess to have much sympathy, nor do we regard them with any hopefulness. This report is to us a saddening proof of the deep rift which exists between the scholastic thought of theologians and the spiritual life of ordinary men. It is hard to believe that anybody outside narrow eccleisastical circles will take any interest in it at the present time.

"We shall have to be unconventional and sink a great many prejudices if we are to win these men"—these words spoken last week in the Lower House of Convocation by the Archdeacon of Lewes have a note of challenge in them to all the churches. They express a conviction which we know is working powerfully in many minds and changing for them their normal outlook upon religious work. We have tried ourselves several times lately to say the same thing and to explain some of our own reasons for holding it to be true. In this connection we may call attention to the letter by Mr. George Tarrant, which appears in our present issue. It comes to us straight from the fighting line, and is one of the plain human documents which teachers of religion at home will do better to ponder than to criticise. It is a fitting close to a discussion which has been running in our columns for some weeks. For ourselves we can only repeat our conviction that it is not a time to lay special stress upon the more external parts of religion. The things which unite men in a common brotherhood of suffering and triumph are within. We are deeply convinced of the presence of God in our life. We feel that we are instruments in his hand for purposes which reach far beyond our mortal sight. We know that his mercy is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and that death is swallowed up in victory. For the moment this is enough. It gives us courage to do to-day's work, and trust to meet the end which may come to us swiftly at any time. Compared with this assurance dwelling in the hearts of men and uniting them in one brotherhood of the faithful, names and ceremonies matter not at all.

A FRENCHMAN'S THOUGHTS ON THE WAR.

In these times many of us have a feeling of isolation which cripples the mind. We have been accustomed in past years to an intercourse wide, and comparatively free, with our fellow-men. The years of war have brought fetters to our utterance, and broken our fellowships. The statistics of loss and waste have no place for facts of this kind; but their reality and tragic significance confront the more serious minds every day. What, actually, do men think, as the long struggle goes on? We partly know our own thoughts, certainly their chief currents. With less assurance, though still considerable, we may claim to know the mind of our own people—a very mingled mind in some respects, a remarkably settled mind in others. Our nation, with small exception, evidently remains convinced that no way of duty was, or is, open to us but that of enforcing order by the resistance and punishment of the law-breakers in the European family to which we belong.

What of other nations? We may infer much or little from such material as gets into our newspapers from abroad; but, as a matter of fact, the amount of this foreign evidence, apart from official reports and picturesque rumours of current events, is very small. Even as regards our closest neighbour and ally, France, we are mostly left to conjecture—more so, it might easily seem, than as regards our worst enemy, Germany; but some of us have long since concluded that, what with the rigorous supervision exercised over German newspapers on the one hand, and the selective bias of English journalists on the other, we are left very much uninformed where we are not gravely misinformed. Leaving that, however, as me must, till the time comes for the veil to be lifted—when we shall all learn how much mistaken many of our estimates have been—we may usefully avail ourselves of any direct means, restricted as it may be, of getting a wider outlook upon the fields of contemporary thought.

Among recent witnesses to the state of opinion in France three or four should be noticed specially. M. Loisy's eloquent and impressive little book on 'War and Religion' has, indeed, received some attention in this country, though it deserves more. For some of us the interest of this utterance is almost as much in the author as in his subject. The eminent scholar and critic, who a few years ago paid the usual penalty of fearless devotion to Biblical science, here writes a scathing indictment of the Rome that cast him off. While emphasising the deplorable failure of Christianity in any or all of its forms to arrest the downfall of Europe into war's pit of horrors and abominations, he particularly upbraids the Catholic authorities for abandoning, on the pretext of "impartiality," the cause of Belgium, whose priests and laity are among the most devoted of adherents to Rome, and whose injuries might well have provoked even a pagan pontiff to interfere. As to his own countrymen's state of mind since the war entered on its chronic phase, M. Loisy gives some information, supplemented by some prophecy. In the latter he forecasts a new organisation of the religious impulses upon an ethical basis, beginning with the fervour of patriotism, which, he maintains, has now practically superseded all other ideals, and progressing towards the universal brotherhood of human kind.

So far as M. Loisy's information goes, it tallies substantially with what we gather from a variety of sources, none more explicit or accessible than M. Paul Sabatier's work, 'A Frenchman's Thoughts on the War.' The book, indeed, originated in response to an invitation from London, and is addressed directly to English readers. The author lays stress on the significant fact that he is not a Parisian, but a dweller among the Cevennes hill-people, remote from the peculiar tendencies of the most centralising of capitals. He writes, too, as a lover of Alsace, for whose sake (as is well known) he long ago resisted a German preferment which would have entailed changing his nationality. He was then in Strasbourg, and his attitude having rendered him suspect to the German authorities, he was compelled to quit the captured province. That was a quarter of a century ago, but we gather that his warmest passion has never ceased to cling to it, and he gives us testimony enough that in this love and longing for its reunion with France he was far from singular. And yet, M. Sabatier's statement is emphatic, that, however, perilous for all the nations this suppressed attachment of Alsace to her motherland undoubtedly was, the greatest wish of the French people, as he knew them, was for peace. It was a "religion" with them. He tells of his experiences among the various groups of different churches and parties, into friendly touch with whom he was brought by his "Francis" studies; all shared the same intense longing for a quiet development of national and social life, for liberation from the perpetual menace of war, for a pacific solution of the issues upon which France and Germany differed. People of culture, peasants, all shared this longing, and received his warnings of Prussian designs as arrows that wounded not only their hope but their faith.

When, in a deeply calculated hour, these designs were turned into actions, the great peace-loving mass of Frenchmen very sadly, very solemnly, and with utmost self-dedication, accepted the call, not of their country only, but, as they believed and felt, of civilisation and humanity. M. Sabatier does not gloss over the faults of his people; he confesses them with shame and a true patriot's contrition. But nothing, as it seems to him, in all the nation's history can compare with this swelling tide of emotion, except that which in 1789 began the Revolution, and that which long ago gave birth to the Crusades. The months have rolled away, but this tide remains full and strong. Whatever the aspects of the struggle in detail, whatever the prospects immediate or distant, this unifying force of conviction remains. Vast efforts, of which we in England have no conception—but, indeed, we mostly know little of the efforts made in our own country—have been put forth and maintained; old party cries have died down; philanthropy has gathered all sorts of "religions" into cordial co-operation. And, says Sabatier, a great religious revival has truly taken place; only men must beware of looking for its signs and its results in merely external things. "The very basis of this war is in a sense religious or spiritual"; it is "an effort to defend, not material wealth, but the ideal tendencies of civilisation, against materialism erected into a systematic doctrine." And to those rather narrow minds that ask "which Church will profit by this revival?" he says, "It will profit all the Churches, even all the anti-churches. In drawing nearer to that ideal towards which, by divers paths, we seek to climb, we draw nearer to one another. The religious revival will profit most those who serve it, not those who make use of it."

We italicise that sentence as one that applies nearer home. Is it not clear that the true well-being, not only of one country but of all, depends ultimately on those who make this principle of service their daily guide?

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

DEATH THE LEVELLER.

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against Fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings:
Sceptre and crown
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill:
But their strong nerves at last must yield;
They tame but one another still:
Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath
When they, pale captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow;
Then boast no more your mighty deeds!
Upon Death's purple altar now
See where the victor-victim bleeds.
Your heads must come
To the cold tomb:
Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in their dust.

James Shirley.

Live your life while you have it. Life is a splendid gift. There is nothing small in it. For the greatest things grow by God's law out of the smallest. But to live your life you must discipline it. You must not fritter it away in "fair purpose, erring act, inconstant will"; but must make your thought, your words, your acts all work to the same end, and that end not self but God. This is what we call Character.

Florence Nightingale.

O THOU loving and tender Father in Heaven, we confess before Thee, in sorrow, how hard and unsympathetic are our hearts; how often we have sinned against our neighbours by want of compassion and tenderness; how often we have felt no true pity for their trials and sorrows, and have neglected to comfort, help and visit them. O Father, forgive this our sin, and lay it not to our charge. Give us grace ever to alleviate the crosses and difficulties of those around us, and never to add to them; teach us to be consolers in sorrow, to take thought for the stranger, the widow, and the orphan; let our charity show itself not in words only, but in deed and truth. Teach us to judge as Thou dost, with forbearance, with much pity and indulgence; and help us to avoid all unloving judgment of others; for the sake of Jesus Christ Thy Son, Who loved us and gave Himself for us. Amen.

DR. DANIEL WILLIAMS AND HIS TRUST.

II.

Those who stood by the grave of Dr. Williams a few weeks ago were reminded that after these two centuries it was still found possible to work on the lines which he laid down and for the objects which he appointed. That is surely a striking proof of the sound judgment and practical sagacity which he applied to the carrying out of his ideas of benevolence. Neither the Court of Chancery, under whose supervision the Trust was administered during the greater part of its existence, nor the Charity Commissioners, under whom it is carried on now, have found it necessary to make any considerable alteration in the nature of the benefactions dispensed under the founder's will. The income of the Trust, after the cost of administration has been paid, is still divided in the proportions specified in the will, and the shares allocated as Dr. Williams directed. The simple machinery of Committees, to look after different branches of the work, is of no recent date; but it serves its purpose as well as, and, perhaps, better than any modern substitute. The system of Quarterly Meetings of the Trustees is enjoined in the will, and if the expense of the meeting somewhat exceeds the forty shillings which Dr. Williams allowed to his Trustees for the purpose, it is nowadays very moderate compared with what was expended sixty or eighty years ago for the same purpose.

But, though the objects of the Trust now are practically the same as they were when it was founded, yet time has altered, in some respects, the relative importance of them. Dr. Williams enumerated as the chief objects of his beneficence poor ministers and their widows, the poor who were to receive gifts of Bibles and catechisms, and other good practical books, divinity students, schools, and special preachers in Wales. His library was only mentioned later, and, although he made provision for the books to be housed and looked after, and intended it to serve as a public library, he does not seem to have thought of it as likely to become very large. Nowadays the Library is by far the largest department of the work of the Trust, and the number of persons who are benefited under the Trust through the Library is many times greater than the number of those who receive grants of money or books. The Library is, indeed, the only part of the Trust where any considerable expansion was possible. There is now an allowance of £600 per annum for the purchase of books and for binding. Any other arrangement of the Trust income would, no doubt, have made possible a few more doles to a few more deserving poor; but that would have been at the expense of what has become, in its quiet way, a very notable institution.

The Library will form the subject of special articles; but it should be said here that it is distinguished from most, if not all other public libraries, in that it is a lending library without subscription, intended especially for scholars and students. Moreover, its readers are not merely such as live in London, and can come for their books. Readers are found all over the British Isles to whom books are regularly sent, and, before the war, books were frequently sent to readers on the Continent. When it is considered how much a minister or clergyman in a country place, far from a library, and with often but small means, is hindered in his studies for want of books, it will be realised how great is the boon offered by Dr. Williams's Library. Nothing more is asked than that the reader shall pay the carriage of his parcel each way, and a fine if the books are kept beyond the time allowed. Any person of 18 years old and upwards is eligible upon the recommendation of two approved guarantors. The ordinary reader is allowed three volumes for one month. Students engaged in special research are granted, when possible, an extension of time and number of books, but only on application to the Librarian. There are now over 66,000 volumes in the Library, mainly in the lines of theology, philosophy, history, economics, or, in a word, the subjects of the serious thinking of the time. The Library was removed from its original home in Red Cross Street in 1864, to temporary quarters in Queen Square, Bloomsbury. A building was erected in Grafton Street, which housed the Library until 1890, and might be still its home if the chance had not been offered, and taken, of acquiring possession of University Hall in Gordon Square, vacated by the removal of Manchester New College to Oxford. The Grafton Street building is now occupied by Messrs. Maple & Co., but is scarcely altered outside, and but little within.

In directing his Trustees how to dispose of the available income after the expenses of administration were paid, Dr. Williams ordered that a fifth part should be set aside for grants to poor ministers, a tenth to ministers' widows, an eighth to books for the poor, an eighth to divinity students, and an eighth to schools. The remainder to be divided between special ministers in North and South Wales.

The grants to ministers usually vary from five to ten pounds, and, perhaps, twenty or thirty grants may be made in a year. They are never given merely in augmentation of salary, but are intended to help a man who is obliged to meet some sudden expense, as on account of sickness, and the like. Even so, it has sometimes been asked whether there is much use in giving a dole of a few pounds, and whether it might not be wiser to give a larger amount to a smaller number of persons. But it is well to remember that these grants are made to ministers so poor that even five pounds bears a large proportion to their whole income. The majority of those who receive grants have an income of less than £100 per annum. In a case within my knowledge the annual income was stated to be less than £27! Where there is such poverty the gifts of the Trust may well be a godsend. It may be useful to add that these grants are restricted to ministers who are moderate and orthodox, and that, consequently, the case mentioned above is not that of a Unitarian. The gift is never treated as an annuity, although it is occasionally repeated for two or three years, as when it is given to help to keep a child at school.

The grants to widows are less numerous, as the available fund is smaller. There is no restriction to persons of orthodox opinions; but, in practice, the majority are widows of orthodox ministers. The Trustees have sometimes allowed the grant to a widow to become a virtual annuity, but the theory is the same as in the case of grants to ministers, viz., that the grant is a special gift to meet a special emergency.

The next object of benefaction is that described in the will as the gift of "Bibles, Catechisms, and good practical books" to the poor. It would be interesting to know what class of persons Dr. Williams had in his mind when he made this provision for "the poor." It has been pointed out that in his time "the poor" did not read, if by the poor are meant ordinary poor people. On the other hand, it is certainly not usual to refer to ministers of scanty means as "the poor." Moreover, they would be probably already provided with Bibles and catechisms and the like. Be that as it may, the fund is now applied, with the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, in making gifts of books to poor ministers, or students or libraries intended for the use of the poor. Also, the books given are not restricted to the kinds specified by Dr. Williams. The Trustees try to help a struggling student with an equipment for study, often some great work of reference, such as Hastings' 'Dictionary of the Bible.' This is a very free rendering of the phrase, "Bibles, catechisms, and other good practical books"; but there is ground for believing that the modern usage may represent what Dr. Williams had in his mind more closely than it appears to do. For there was during the last years of his life, a society whose object was to make such gifts of books to ministers as are made now. Many of those whom he chose for his first Trustees were members of this society, possibly he was a member himself. I found recently a bundle of papers containing the records of the grants for several years (I was interested to find a grant to my great-great-great-grandfather amongst them), and these records suggest that Dr. Williams may have intended to carry on some similar work. Be that as it may, there is no doubt that the Trust, with its present generous interpretation of the founder's words, does an amount of substantial good which would surely have pleased him. The grants are made either on the recommendation of individual Trustees or of a Committee considering applications sent in to them; but all are finally the gift of the Trustees collectively.

Dr. Williams seems to have thought of helping his brother ministers at all stages of their career. Having set aside something for their poverty, for the relief of their widows, and for the furtherance of their studies, he turned his attention to their preparation for the ministry. Two sets of scholarships are now offered by the Trustees, both intended for men going in for the ministry amongst Protestant Dissenters. Those of the one set are for undergraduate students at Glasgow; and although the funds for this purpose were left by Dr. Williams, and although his Trustees appoint the scholars, yet the funds are held and administered by the University of Glasgow. The other scholarships are for graduate students, and are to be held at some approved theological college. They are given mainly, but not exclusively, upon the results of an examination held every year by examiners chosen by the Trustees. The candidates must, according to the terms of the will, be "of South Britain," a phrase whose interpretation has sometimes been much debated. Usually two scholarships are offered and won each year, and there is generally a fair competition amongst promising men from the leading Nonconformist Colleges. The benefactions under the head of schools were originally applied to the support of schoolmasters in various parts of the country, but especially in Wales, where much of Dr. Williams's property lies. The early records of the Trust contain frequent reference to the ill-will shown towards these schoolmasters, who were Dissenters, by the clergy of the places where they held their schools. Latterly, the benefactions take the form of a grant in aid of the maintenance of a girls' school in Dolgelley, known as Dr. Williams's School, though no longer under the chief control of his Trustees, and also of exhibitions in the Wrexham Council School to boys and girls approved by the Trustees.

Both these benefactions are now for the benefit of Wales. Dr. Williams, it will be remembered, was born at Wrexham, and throughout his life his heart was always warm towards Wales. He directed that his Trustees should appoint "persons of sober and moderate principles to preach the word of God in Wales." The practice now is to invite men of experience and ability to become "special ministers," and to undertake work in their neighbourhood with the object of helping weak and struggling churches. A fixed stipend is given for this work, and a report received. The appointment is for one year only, but is generally renewed. The usual term is five or six years.

There are other objects supported by Dr. Williams's bequests, but not immediately under the control of the Trustees. In the case of certain small benefactions they merely act as a channel through which a definite payment is made to a definite person, apart from their own choice or even approval. They pay a fixed sum to certain Trustees in Ireland to be applied towards the maintenance of an Irish preacher, meaning a person to preach in the Irish language. This is one of the few provisions of the founder's will which seems less suitable to our time than he thought it to be to his. Perhaps it may some day be modified, as was that other provision for reprinting periodically Dr. Williams's own writings. The money which would have been applied to that object is now more usefully spent in making grants for educational purposes, without distinction of creed.

Such, in brief, is the work done now by the Dr. Williams's Trust. Without being able to cover a very wide field of philanthropy it does, in a quiet way, a great amount of good. If the founder knew, or if he knows, what is being done at the present day by his Trustees and their officers, he will know that it is being done by those who honour him for a good friend to his fellow men, and who themselves are honoured in being allowed a share in carrying on the work which he began.

THOMAS LENNY.

AN APPRECIATION.

There has passed away in his 87th year a brave veteran, "a grand old man" of humble origin, whose life, saddened by cruelty inflicted upon him in childhood and chequered by privations later, has been one long striving for noble causes—an outward expression of intense inward aspiration to realise his ideals for the uplifting of the people. Even during his last illness—the slow "breaking of the chains which bound the soul to earth"—when physical vitality was ebbing, the brave sufferer put aside weakness and pain, and with uplifted arm and flashing eye he spoke words of prophetic optimism as to the future of the people and the dawn of religious unity when the night of misconceptions and of outworn creeds has passed away. "The people have tasted Freedom and the breath of anything less exalted will never satisfy them. The pendulum has swung back, but only to take a wider leap forward, God helping!" He spoke of "that bright particular star (Unitarianism), which will grow brighter and brighter and be the means of uniting sects in a common brotherhood. Faith in outworn creeds and the trappings of religious worship only hide the splendour of the teachings of Christ, and must ultimately dwindle in face of the rising dawn of a nobler faith." Many have been the hot discussions held with visitors belonging to the High Anglican Church who have tried to pilot Thomas Lenny into the "safe harbour" of the established faith; but with his whole being strung to the fight, arguments, texts, illuminating Scripture interpretations have poured forth, and finally driven the astonished assailant off the field, shaken, and, let us hope, humbled. He held a strong conviction that the Pauline theology was hiding the true light of Christianity under a distorting haze of misconception and unreality, and that the real beauty and simplicity of the message of Jesus were hardly yet understood.

Born in the early decades of last century his early life was full of hardship, tinged with romance. When a little child of 7 he was thrust out of doors on a winter's night by a cruel stepmother. Half starved and beaten he wandered in the direction of Uxbridge, and was finally sheltered in a barn by a drover, who let him sleep with his dog. Some passing gipsies took the little lad with them and taught him their tricks. In their company he wandered over England, gaining an intimate knowledge of nature and of the highways and byways of parts seldom then visited. By mending the gipsies' clothes he obtained a facility with the needle which helped him to become a tailor. All his book knowledge was self-taught in later life. His memory, keen to the last, went back to the miseries endured by the people before the Repeal of the Corn Laws, and before legislation had lessened the appalling privations endured by many with the silence of inarticulate despair. It has been a privilege to hear from an eye-witness (so few are left now) the graphic story of those "dark ages" of municipal incompetence, when pestilence was always present, when unadulterated food was not obtainable except at an exorbitant price by the rich; when the use of water—that beneficent gift of God—was jealously restricted; when the wretched hovels of the poor were disease-impregnated by bad drainage and accumulated filth. Indignation and pity at these things led Thomas Lenny to join the various agitations which had for their object the uplifting of the people, and no personal risk, no insult or privation, ever led him to abandon a cause he thought right. He has done "his bit" nobly and fearlessly. The fine face, now still in death, is eloquent of the spirit's long warfare on earth; it speaks of the "passing on" of a brave soldier of God to a grander realisation of His will.

Katharine Bruce.

THE CARTER'S POTATO-PATCH.

A few years ago some of the young fellows of the village, getting together of an evening outside the inn, surprised themselves by resolving on a plan of campaign. Slowly but surely, as days and weeks passed, the pros and cons were discussed, and at length a letter was written on a grimy half sheet of notepaper, signed by half-a-dozen of them, and delivered into the hands of the Chairman of the Parish Council; praying him at the same time to use his best influence to secure the realisation of their humble bequest. This was to the effect that the Parish Council should take steps to secure allotments for the signatories and others who had little or no garden ground. Things move proverbially slowly in the country, but in this instance before many months had passed an arrangement had been arrived at with a neighbouring landlord by which the Parish Council was to be allowed, for a nominal rental, to enclose a piece of useless waste on the common and cultivate it in allotments. Certain of the village elders who had good gardens were not above making fun of the enterprise, prophesying that no one would have the courage to break a bit of common which the cart wheels of generations had made as hard as the high road, and which, if it were turned up, would be worthless for cultivation. There was much to support this common-sense view. The land had never borne anything but gorse and a felt of short heather. If one took a pickaxe, which was necessary, to sample it, little was brought to light but sand and stones, so that those who smiled drily and said that they would not have the land as a gift seemed to speak with reason. Nevertheless, that strip of barren common is, to-day, a profitable garden. A barbed wire fence was soon put up to enclose the patch of two and three-quarter acres, which, when pegged out by the old schoolmaster into eleven quarter-acre sections, was let to the tenants at 5*s.* a year each. And now came the pull. To break up that land took several years. For a labourer in the country has only his evenings and an occasional public holiday on which to do his own work, and this had to be done literally foot by foot. First, as much as possible of the top growth cleared off with axe and hook, and burnt. Then the long strong gorse roots and stumps got out with the grubbing-axe, and the tough heath peeled off with turving-iron. Next the pick and the four-pronged fork and spade came into play, and I have seen more than one fork whose steel prongs were worn down to impotence like the teeth of an old horse over this back-breaking job. Not only had the stoney top-soil to be dealt with, but, within a foot or so of the surface was a bed of "callus," a black or red sandy hardbake which must be thoroughly broken up, or the ground will be water-logged. Again, this work can only be accomplished in the winter when the rain has done something to soften the soil. It is too hard for anything to be effected in the summer.

No wonder that some of the original holders lost heart and surrendered or neglected their pieces. But the majority held on bravely, and if they could get no time themselves employed a neighbour who happened to be out of work. Thus the first year's operations resulted in two or three sections being completed. Of the rest, one half, a third, or a quarter of the allotment was dug, or no beginning had been made. To-day all are in full cultivation. What does that signify? What amount and value of produce can be raised in such poor soil? Let us see. Lot 3 appears to have been handled in the most advantageous way. It is worked by an elderly man, a carter, who can write a scrawl for his name in receipting a bill, but nothing more. For the past two years he has planted his quarter-acre with potatoes. At the end of last August he dug his crop, which yielded thirty-six sacks or three and a half tons of large sound tubers. These at £6 a ton have fetched £21. Against that must be reckoned the cost of seed, manure, rent, and labour, which may be reckoned at £5, thus:—

Seed, two sacks of "Up-to-dates" at 12*s.* a sack ..	1	4	0
Sixteen loads of manure at 2*s.* 6*d.*	2	0	0
Rent	0	5	0
Labour, eight days at 3*s.* a day	1	4	0
Six pounds of mustard seed ..	0	2	0
To sinking fund for breaking up land	0	5	0

Net profit, £16.

As a matter of fact the working expenses were fully a pound less, as some of the manure was from the tenant's own animals, and the rest he bought at 1*s.* 6*d.* a load when he went to town with goods and brought back in his otherwise empty cart. Peter is a sensible man, who only expects to get good returns from land that he has fed generously, especially when that land was amazingly hungry to begin with. Moreover he does not depend wholly on the stockyard for manure. The day the potatoes were lifted the land was sown with mustard, which explains the item above, "six pounds of mustard seed." By December the piece was covered with a green crop a foot high, ready to be ploughed in. The mustard plant is an excellent fertiliser.

This simple story—commonplace if you will—is not without its application. The majority of the English people, far from the thought of potato bread, are living in unwonted abundance. But the need of economy, recognised already by the few, may yet have to be acknowledged by the many. On the vegetal side of our diet potatoes are a good second to the cereals, and invaluable for the feeding of farm animals and poultry. It may be that Germany would have had to cry "halt!" before now but for her large supply of potatoes. The best land is already in cultivation. People sometimes talk of land as they do of children's brains, as though it were possible to raise half-a-dozen crops at once on the same area. The need to-day is for a larger supply of home-grown produce, but the good land is, in many instances, yielding its maximum. The question arises, What may yet be got out of the poor and waste land, either during or after the war. The carter's potato-patch is an answer—£64 worth of potatoes per acre. There are many such waste acres in England. H. M. L.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—At the last meeting of the Committee, the Sunday School Association decided to support your appeal of January 29 for a hut for rest and recreation which the Belgian Hospital Fund is anxious to provide for the Belgian Army at an important centre in France. They are, therefore, inviting the scholars of our Sunday Schools and the young people of our congregations to make a united effort to present the hut to the Belgian Army through the Belgian Hospital Fund, as last year they presented to the British Red Cross Society the motor ambulance which has since done such splendid service in France. A fund is to be opened at once for this purpose, and a letter will be sent out in the course of the next few days calling attention to the appeal. Contributions should be addressed to the Hon. Treasurer of the Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.—Yours, &c.

'THE FREE CATHOLIC.'

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—A plain layman, unskilled in ecclesiastical and theological dialectics, I have seen and known what religion means to men who are undergoing tests about the most severe that human beings could be called upon to undergo. May I, therefore, be allowed a word upon the subject so prominently in the minds of some at present.

Some speak, Sir, of "the Sacrament"—the highest act of communion with the Unseen that a man may experience. The men on whom we glibly say (not knowing what we are saying) the future of European civilisation depends, know what communion means, when they go with a smile to their death, and know the hand of the living God held out to them in the darkness. Worship, out here, is the same reality, whether in a little village church of Roman Catholic France, or at a Calvinistic Church Parade in some unlovely barn, or in the silence of the trenches, where the song of the bullets is the only music. It was said of old that worship must be in spirit—we, out here, have known what worship in spirit means. All of us, professed Atheist or Theist, Mystic or Agnostic, Individualist or Sacerdotalist, have met the same Divine Help and Comfort in the hour of our extremity. To us communion is a very real thing. It needs no priest nor consecrated bread to bring God's hand into touch with ours.

It is, therefore, with deep regret that I see the time and energy of men of our faith spent in academic discussion of the particular roads whereby we may approach the Divine Presence. If to some the Unitarianism that is to me the highest form of expressed religion is insufficient, and a more richly symbolic utterance is essential, let these, by all means, take the road that is to them the most direct. If, in the growth of the world the more symbolic faith is destined to become the inclusive religion, so be it—time alone will show. It used to be the pride of our liberal faith that any man could follow his own conscience whithersoever it might lead him. If it be to the Free Catholic position it is well. If to the simpler, and, to some of us, deeper and older Unitarian faith, it is also well. Is the world too small to hold both?

An intimate friend of mine out here, once found himself forced to remain inactive for some time, alone, in a position where death seemed inevitable and instantly imminent. By a miracle he escaped, unhurt. He told me that he felt, during that time of trial, strangely happy and contented; his only grief being that, perhaps, those he was leaving to mourn his death would not know and feel the Divine handclasp as clearly as he did.

So may I be bold to appeal, with all the earnestness that my position entitles me to use, to those to whom have not come the dangers and privileges of life here. We have gone forth, not knowing whither, and have left those near and dear to us in the charge of you. Must our appeal be drowned in these voices that wrangle over sacerdotalism and ceremonial? Is it not enough to comfort the mourner, to bind up the broken in heart, to carry light into the dark places, and to bring to all the good news of the help that we have found in our need and the assurance of the strength and support that wait for them in their extremity?

We have our duty to do, and shall do it at whatever cost; but we shall do it with a greater joy if we know that those whom we have left have found the depths of the Divine Love below the ripples of changing ceremonial and differing creed. It is to those who remain at home that a duty no less urgent belongs—the duty of setting aside petty differences and helping in the one common effort. We have set everything aside, and are but instruments whereby victory may be brought a little near. Surely, at home, men may be found who will feel the call to one common work, and the need for sinking differences and standing shoulder to shoulder for their part in the fight. They will learn, therein, how much deeper is the Spirit than the form of worship, and will know that all who seek the Father in Spirit and in truth will find Him by whatever road they come.—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I notice that Dr. Weston makes the genial accusation that we begin our movement in theft by "stealing" the word "Catholic," which, according to him belongs only to the Roman Church and the churches in communion with it. Thus, the Russian Church, numbering many scores of millions of members who claim the Catholic name, with the Roumanian, Serbian, Greek, and other "Holy Catholic, Apostolic, and Orthodox" Churches; the Church of England, with her children the Episcopal Churches of America, the Colonies, and other countries, and those non-Episcopal and Nonconformist Churches (like the Wesleyan), who use the Apostle's Creed, and say, "I believe in....the Holy Catholic Church," or "pray for the good estate of the Catholic Church"—all these, not being Roman or in communion with Rome, are also arrant rogues like ourselves. As Dr. Weston must believe what he says, I can only leave him to continue his researches in the ancient Fathers to whom our Free Churches notoriously defer.

The truth is we have not begun this movement at all either in theft or otherwise. We found it in being as the better tradition of our own group of churches. It is not merely that far away back certain heretical Reformers called themselves (as I remember Dr. Edwin Odgers telling me) Liberi Catholici, but that all our Baxterian strain of tradition has consistently claimed the word "Catholic." I wish very much that some one would reprint Richard Baxter's two great sermons on 'Catholic Unity' and 'The True Catholic; or, The Catholic Church Described,' and thereby shame every sectarianism of the Churches and make them claim to be properly within the Catholic Church of Christ. The older Unitarianism, of which you and Miss Hollins speak with an affection and piety not one whit too generous, was quite sound on this point, and never hesitated to "steal" the word "Catholic." J. J. Tayler, for example, wrote the pamphlet, 'A Catholic Christian Church the Want of our Time.' Martineau instructed me, through such essays as his 'Church-Life? or Sect-Life?' in my first lessons in Free Catholicism. We cannot remind our churches too often of his classical utterance, on a memorable occasion, that if any one "being of our Catholic communion calls his chapel or its congregation Unitarian, he is a traitor to his spiritual ancestry and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors." So far, at anyrate, we Free Catholics are entirely faithful to our best traditions.

But Christianity is something far more spiritually opulent and morally regal than any one line of tradition, even when it is so noble as that of the old Unitarian families. We must, therefore, beware of boasting overmuch, "We have Abraham to our father." "I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise children unto Abraham." That, in truth, with our Lord's words about his mother and sisters and brothers, and with St. Paul's claim to become an apostle to the Gentiles, indicates the best service any of us can render to our diminutive Israel, if it is ever to become something more than

A little garden fenced around
A chosen and peculiar ground, and assume its proper place and function in the broad fields of national life and of the Catholic sentiment of Christendom.

I would, therefore, ask you patiently to permit Free Catholics to remind the better type of Unitarianism that still struggles to hold its own against the stealthy grip of the sectarian type, that it is a vain thing to try to live on the pride of its own traditions, however worthy they may be, and that it must not suffer itself to become a parasite on its own past. Nor must your readers become exasperated with us if we believe that the name Unitarian, like that of Arian, Arminian, or Calvinistic Trinitarian which it followed, has seen its day and had now better be abandoned. We have to contemplate all these phases of thought in a vaster perspective. Let the dead bury their dead but suffer us to preach the Catholic Faith of the Kingdom of God. No war will hinder us, though the earth reel under the shock of clashing armies, from carrying on this work while we have breath. We will try to deliver the full message of entire historic Christianity to our day, and do our little best to make straight, even in this desert of desolation and destruction, a highway for our God. If Christ is anywhere he is on the battlefield and here at home; he is now, and not merely in times of secular peace; he is always even unto the end of the world.

We regret to have to disturb the composure of those who, as you say, "temperamentally dislike being hurried into new points of view." Not only temperamentally, but with intelligent deliberation and conviction, we dislike standing still and silent while the churches are looking distractedly for firm and resolute guidance. If the lovers of soothing words and soft slumbers are agreed to remain where they are, we can only bid them an affectionate but regretful "Good night," and, sounding the advance, march on.—Yours, &c.

J. M. Lloyd Thomas.

Birmingham, February 22, 1916.

[We have received other letters on the same subject for which we cannot find room. We do not think that Mr. Thomas's attempt to trace his movement, with its highly-coloured sacramental language and its use of the word "Catholic" in an ecclesiastical sense, back to Dr. Martineau, is in the least justified. This correspondence is now closed.—Ed. of Inq.].

THE CASUALTY LISTS.

A Correspondent writes:—

Day by day the papers publish long lists of casualties from the various fronts of the war; month by month official figures are issued giving the total of killed, wounded, prisoners, and missing from our own forces. We cannot face these figures and realise all they mean—heroism and courage, suffering and tragedy—without at the same time feeling the very foundations of our life shaking, unless we have a great faith in God and a belief in immortality. Without that faith and that belief it is all such a waste, so unnecessary, so profitless. But the man who believes in God and immortality sees things from a different angle, has a truer perspective, and knows that those whose names figure in these daily lists are giving that which is invaluable, that which cannot be profitless. They—their deeds of heroism, their hours of suffering—will be the foundation on which a new heaven and a new earth will be built in our midst. The builders of this Kingdom of God must be we who are still at home, we who are too old or too infirm to take our place in the ranks across the waters. The task that awaits us, though we stay at home, is not the easier one: no excitement of battle gives us the dare-devilry needful for leaping over the parapets and rushing at the enemy's trenches; youthful blood has ceased to tingle in our veins; there is no mass consciousness to feed our failing courage. Ours is a fight in cold blood, with every detail calmly planned and the knowledge that the enemy before us has entrenched himself in the soul of the nation through long ages of disregard and carelessness, and the scarcely veiled hostility of the vested interests that have had matters too much their own way in the past.

But dare we face those who have borne the heat of the day, who return to our midst maimed and mangled, those who are mourning husbands and brothers and sons who will not return—dare we face these with cries of praise and patriotism on our lips and our hands empty? What shall we have to show them as earnest of our sincerity? Khaki brassard and war-work badge are not sufficient. The time will come when the nation will decide to erect some memorial to her fallen sons. And rightly so. But no memorial of carven stone can be worth a single subscription, no memorial can be worthy those who upheld her name and honour, unless there be erected at the same time another memorial of flesh and blood reclaimed from the follies of the past and dedicated to the regenerated future. The only memorial of any worth whatever must be a nation born anew. Shall our brothers and our sons have died in vain? They are fighting not merely against militarism and all that that stands for; they are fighting for the purification of our national and individual life. And it is for us who are left at home, who are anxiously wishing we could take our part side by side with them, to answer, shall it be in vain? It may be too early to talk of peace; it is not too early to talk of war, a war to the death against all the sins and injustices rife in the world to-day. The cry that comes insistently to non-combatants is, "Prepare. Make up your minds while yet there is time, and begin." The men in the trenches have fought gloriously. Shall we, in craven fear, do nothing to consolidate the new position? Shall we once more be unprepared and let the great opportunity slip by? Shall they fight and die in vain?

FIFTY YEARS' WORK IN DUNDEE.

JUBILEE OF THE REV. HENRY WILLIAMSON.

It is with sincere respect and hearty congratulations that we record the interesting fact that the Rev. Henry Williamson has completed fifty years as Minister of the Unitarian Church, Dundee. His ministry has been marked by unfailing missionary ardour and a deep interest in the public welfare of the community ; but its richest fruits can be known only to the people to whom he has been the beloved friend and minister for so many years. The jubilee was celebrated at a meeting held on Saturday, February 19, when Mr. Williamson was the recipient of many good wishes and congratulations, as well as gifts, which took the form of a cheque from the Scottish Unitarian Association, and an address from the congregation of the Unitarian Church, in addition to a gold pendant for Miss Williamson. It was in February, 1866, that Mr. Williamson first preached from the pulpit which he has occupied ever since, and in that time he has achieved a record both for pastoral work, and for untiring activity on behalf of all movements for social and educational reform in the city, of which both he and his friends may well be proud. Previous to his coming the church can scarcely be said to have had a positive and settled existence. Local Unitarianism had held its place for eighty-one years, since it originated in the freedom of thought of the Rev. Thomas Fyshe Palmer, who was banished later to Botany Bay among the famous "political martyrs" of Scotland, but it had languished considerably until about 1865, when it received an accession of membership, including several prominent citizens, and secured the support of the Scottish Association. Mr. Williamson was born at Godalming, and emigrated to America when 18 years of age, but returned home on the outbreak of the American Civil War. Even in those early days he took a warm interest in all social and religious movements that concerned the welfare of the working classes, and thus was brought into contact with the late Dr. John Relly Beard, under whom he studied for the ministry at the Unitarian Home Missionary Board in Manchester. When he began his ministry in Dundee the services were held at the Thistle Hall in Union Street, but after a time a determined effort was made to raise funds for the erection of a proper place of worship, as a result of which the present church was built in 1870. Ever since that time it has been associated, through its minister, with educational and industrial, no less than religious progress in Dundee, where Mr. Williamson's practical sympathy with the workers found scope in the institution of free evening schools, special classes for instructing girls in domestic economy, the introduction of manual training in the schools, and the institution of the Dundee Mill and Factory Operatives' Union, for women. After many unsuccessful attempts to obtain a seat on the School Board, he was returned fourth on the list in 1891, and since then has been indefatigable in his efforts to promote educational development and extend equal facilities to the children of the poor as well as those of the rich. He has often met with much opposition, but it has been overcome in a most patient and persevering way, with good results which have absolutely justified his labours for every good cause.

The chair was taken on Saturday night by Dr. J. K. Wood, and among those present were the Rev. A. Gordon ; Messrs. A. A. Tayler and H. Chatfeild-Clarke, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association ; Mr. A. MacLaren, Secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association ; Miss Barlow, Senior Vice-President ; Miss Brown, President of the Sunday Schools Union ; and Mr. Twaddle, Glasgow. Prominence was given in all the speeches to the part which Mr. Williamson has played in building up the congregation and strengthening the cause of the church in Dundee. The presentation from the congregation was made by Mr. C. H. David, who had been one of those present at the minister's induction. Mr. Williamson, he said, had rendered valuable services to the community at large in the interests of education and the physical and moral uplifting of the working classes. He announced that a large stained glass panel is to be inserted in the centre of the west window to commemorate his long pastorate. The panel will depict an angel bearing a scroll with the words, "Behold, I bring you tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," with the following inscription beneath :—"Erected by the congregation to celebrate the completion of fifty years' ministry by the Rev. Henry Williamson, 1866–1916."

In replying to all the kind things that had been said, and acknowledging the gifts, which were an earnest of the warm relations existing between him and those with whom he had been associated, Mr. Williamson gave an interesting account of the events that had marked his ministry. As to the value of the work he had done, however, it was left for other speakers to dwell upon.

Speeches were given by the Rev. A. Gordon, Mr. Twaddle, Miss Brown, Mr. A. A. Tayler, Mr. H. Chatfeild-Clarke, Mr. MacLaren, Miss Barlow, and Mr. Meldrum, one of the oldest members of the congregation, who, in moving a vote of thanks, recalled the services Mr. Williamson had rendered in organising the mill workers of the city.

The Rev. A. Gordon occupied the pulpit at both services in the church on Sunday, and preached discourses appropriate to the occasion.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ringwood.—After a stay of four months here the Rev. C. E. Mercer has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to remain as Minister.

South Wales.—The Rev. W. H. Drummond has been on a visit to some of the churches in South Wales in connection with the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund. On Friday, the 18th inst., he spoke at a representative meeting at Llandyssul, when Mr. John Lewis, M.A., the Headmaster of the County School, was in the chair. The meeting had been organised under the auspices of an Interdenominational Committee at the instance of the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas. It was to be followed by a house to house collection on behalf of the Fund throughout the town. On Sunday, Mr. Drummond preached at Swansea for the Rev. Simon Jones, who is away in France on Red Cross service. Collections were taken at both services for the Fund. On Monday evening, the 21st inst., a meeting was held in the Highland Place Church, Aberdare. The Rev. Evan T. Evans presided, and opened the meeting with a short devotional service. Among others present were the Revs. W. J. Phillips, E. R. Dennis, and J. Carrara Davis, and much interest was shown in Mr. Drummond's account of the work of the Fund and his personal experiences during his visits to the Belgian hospitals in France.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

Museums and the Children's Education.

The possibility that the Government may extend its closing order in regard to the national museums and art galleries to similar institutions throughout the country, gives special significance to the interesting account of an experiment at the Manchester Museum described by the Keeper of the Museum, Dr. W. M. Tattersall. A most effective scheme is in operation here for giving instruction to school children who are at present on "half time," owing to the fact that several of the elementary schools in Manchester are now in use as military hospitals, and as many as 1,000 of these young scholars attend classes and courses of lectures on biology, geology, and Egyptology in a week. Nine classes of one hour's duration are held daily. Each lecture consists of from thirty to forty minutes' instruction, followed by a tour of the cases in the Museum in which specimens bearing on the subject of the lecture are exhibited. The teachers have been provided with a duplicate set of specimens, which may be handled freely by the children, and the keenness of the latter, as evinced by the regularity of their attendance and the essays which they write, is a most encouraging sign of success. Such work in connection with the elementary schools has long been needed, and Dr. Tattersall will not be alone in thinking that the economies which would be achieved by the closing of institutions where the foundations of real knowledge are being so well and truly laid, are more than balanced by the benefits received by our future citizens.

George Meredith's Last Letter.

Although in the volume of Meredith's Letters, published by Messrs. Constable four years ago one written to Mr. Watts-Dunton on April 13, 1909, is stated to have been the last he ever wrote, there is a later one addressed to the late G. W. Foote, written towards the end of April, and only about three weeks before his death. In it he refers to Swinburne's funeral, and referring to what he termed in an earlier letter Foote's "valiant fight that is destined for victory," says, "As a question of supporting your paper my name is at your disposal." In 1878, writing to Foote in a letter of four full pages, he said:—"To feel that men like you and 'B.V.' [James Thomson, the author of 'The City of Dreadful Night'] read and have a taste for what I produce is full of encouragement to me to write on with good heart.....As to my poems, I have lost the ardour for publishing them; perhaps in a year or two they may appear; I am well content to remain unpublished while the poems of 'B. V.' are withheld." Foote was an early and a staunch admirer of George Meredith, and eight autograph letters from the latter form one of the most interesting features of the well-known secularist's library, which has been bought by Messrs. Dobell of Charing Cross Road. Mr. Bertram Dobell and Foote were friends for over thirty years.

War Memorials.

The question of war memorials, and the opportunities which will be offered to artists and craftsmen by the demand for them when the present conflict is over, is exercising many minds. The Civic Arts Association, which was inaugurated last month, proposes to give counsel and aid in the designing of such memorials—national, communal, regimental, and personal—and Prof. S. D. Adshead, F.R.I.B.A., is giving a series of six lectures on the subject at University College, Gower Street, illustrated with lantern pictures. Canon Rawnsley naturally advocates the preservation of places of historic interest or natural beauty as one of the best ways of commemorating the heroic dead, and an offer will be laid before the National Trust at their next meeting of twenty-six acres of glorious moorland within reach of one of our large Lancashire cities "in memory of one known to be a lover of nature who has fallen in the war." Canon Rawnsley also suggests in the same connection, the endowing of our unendowed schools with scholarships that will admit the brighter scholars who are otherwise quite unable to do so to pass to the universities.

Youthful Offenders.

In spite of the belief held by Mr. Homer T. Lane, the founder and superintendent of the Little Commonwealth, that child-criminals generally have quicker brains and a richer fund of vitality than other children, most of us will probably agree with other experts that the lack of discipline and restraint is, in most cases, the real cause of youthful wrong-doing. At all events the decrease in the number of juvenile misdemeanants of late years—in spite of a recrudescence of bad propensities in some quarters, which we hope is only temporary, and for which the war is largely responsible—has been most marked, and this is undoubtedly due to such factors as the Children's Charter, the vigilance of school attendance officers, the Boy Scouts, and other similar organisations, and the prohibition of street trading for boys and girls under 14 and 16 respectively. In 1904, for instance, the number of cases of juvenile offences liable to prosecution reached 15,971. In 1913 the number had fallen to 8,772! During 1913 788 boys and 318 girls were committed to industrial schools, while at the actual reformatory schools the accommodation was considerably in excess of the requirements. Truancy, it is said, has become almost extinct in the London districts.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

IT will be good news to our readers, and especially to those with motherly hearts, that we have decided to provide the equipment for a small hospital for Belgian refugee children "somewhere in France." Mrs. Allen has inspected the proposed building and finds it quite suitable. There are in the neighbourhood twenty-two "Colonies Scolaires Belges," many of the children being orphans and all of them entirely separated from home and parents till the war is over. Hitherto there has been no provision for dealing with illness or for isolating infectious cases, and the hospital will be a great boon. It will contain thirty beds, and all the arrangements will be as simple and economical as is constituent with comfort. Nursing and medical attendance and the housekeeping expenses will be provided, but the rest it will be our joy and privilege to give. Can we make this a gift from the mothers among our readers? £150 will go a long way towards covering the cost.

IN spite of the very severe weather Mrs. Allen's tour of inspection has been full of encouragement. Everywhere our Fund is looked upon as a tried and trusted friend, and the improvements which it has introduced into many places are really remarkable. Thus Mrs. Allen writes this week about her visit to one of the Convalescent Depots which we saw under very different conditions last autumn. "The Belgian Convalescent Depot is in the same two villas on the cliff, but greatly improved—beds quite good and a room to the left of the entrance is now a sitting-room, with tables, chairs, open fire, library, gramophone, and quite nice.—More games wanted!" A consignment of children's clothes which we sent out lately has been acknowledged in the following terms: "The clothes for our little girls arrived last night, and I hasten to thank you for them. Some of them have had the clothes given to them already, and they are enchanted with them. If only you could see their delight!" An English nurse writes a letter of enthusiastic thanks for the comforts which we have sent for her Belgian soldiers. Her wards now look so much more comfortable and home-like. And, of course, she wants more! Who will say that there is no healing for our own hearts in this romance of human kindness?

THERE is no inconsistency in pleading as hard as we can for continued support of this work at a time when we are told that we must be economical if we want to win the war. Not one man in ten thousand can be described as extravagant in his charities. We must save upon what we spend upon ourselves, and make up our minds that we can be perfectly happy and contented with fewer luxuries and a simpler standard of living. This was the note which was struck at the meeting held at the Guildhall on Wednesday in order to inaugurate a national economy campaign. "The purpose of this meeting," Mr. McKenna said, "is economy, private individual economy, economy by local authorities, economy by Government departments, economy throughout the nation in the consumption of commodities. We have to make up our minds which needs are to come first, whether the capital and labour shall first of all be found for the service of the war, and only in the second place for our own individual private wants."

MR. MCKENNA went on to suggest that what was needed was an examination of conscience on the matter of expenditure.

> I turn to myself [he said], and I say, "Have you ever examined the ordinary course of your everyday life; have you looked at all the items of your expenditure and consumption; and have you made up your mind on which is the sound principle, how much of that consumption is necessary for the maintenance of efficiency, and how much is merely idle expenditure consequent upon habit?"

Fortunately there are a good many people who would come out unreproved even from such a severe test as this. They have always lived simply. Their food and clothing have cost them little. They have been quite happy without expensive recreations. The noble things of the mind have always meant a great deal to them, and their chief desire has been to give their children a good education. Such people are the salt of the community. At the present time they are quite unconsciously rendering an important social service in proving to many of us that we can live sparely without surrendering any of the enduring sources of happiness. Let the man who can no longer afford to ride a horse or drive a motor remember that he can get at least as much health and pleasure from long country walks.

WE cannot close our reference to the Guildhall Meeting without calling attention to the direct and practical speech of Lord Kitchener. He spoke not as an economist but as a soldier, and his appeal was to the chivalrous desire of the people at home to do their utmost to help the men in the trenches. His maxim was, Work harder and consume less.

> If we admit [he said] that those who are left behind are going to work only as hard as they worked before, and each man and woman is to produce only as much as before, and if all the consumers that are left behind—that is, all the civilian population—are going to consume as much as they did before, whether in the way of food or clothing or luxuries, or anything else, then our problem will be insoluble.... If men and women do not work their hardest and do not save as much as they can, so far from contributing to the national cause they are in fact directly injuring it, and also are hindering their friends and relations in the trenches. I feel sure that this has only to be understood and realised for every one to do what is clearly and simply his duty to the utmost of his power.

Germany's announcement about a new form of submarine warfare has evidently been made for American consumption, for there is nothing new about it except in the attempted justification. Our Government has torn the whole German case to shreds by the publication of a long list of unarmed British and neutral vessels which were torpedoed without warning last year. President Wilson has refused to have anything to do with this fresh German manœuvre, and has appealed to Congress for a direct endorsement of his policy. "The honour and self-respect of the nation," he says, "are involved. We covet peace and shall preserve it at any cost but loss of honour." On our part we must, of course, be prepared for fresh developments of "frightfulness"; but it is of chief importance for us to note the admission that Germany finds resistance to attack on the part of our merchantmen highly inconvenient, and her failure to manœuvre President Wilson into lending a hand to curtail our legitimate use of sea-power.

An important letter by Dr. J. H. Jowett of New York on the subject of Anglo-American differences appeared in The Manchester Guardian last week. He states his opinion, with all courtesy and moderation, that immense good might result from an accredited English mission to the United States at the present moment.

There is in this country [he says] a considerable amount of feeling, arising, I think, out of misunderstanding, but which may easily darken into prejudice or harden into actual ill-will. It is, perhaps, at present no more than irritation, and I think much of it is without any legitimate foundation. But the misunderstandings are not entirely on this side of the water. The somewhat leisurely and even slow diplomacy of President Wilson has given annoyance to all of us, and the annoyance has often passed into indignation. But this very feeling is apt to cloud our vision and to make us entertain opinions which are altogether unwarranted. I feel perfectly sure that one of Germany's main motives in seeking a settlement of the Lusitania question is that she may be able to urge the American Government to bring a more irritating pressure to bear upon the English nation. Let my countrymen understand that the great solid body of American sentiment and conviction is with the Allies, and is stronger now than it has ever been. But I still think it would be an act fraught with the largest and happiest possibilities if our Government were to appoint some man in whom both peoples have confidence to settle all these difficulties and bring the relationships of the two nations into the most intimate concord. There is no man who could do this so well as Lord Bryce, and his very appointment would be hailed with acclamation by the American people.

We hear with great pleasure that Prof. Gilbert Murray has gone on a special mission of enlightenment to the Swedish universities. The visit has been arranged by the Union of Students' Societies in Sweden, who have heard a great deal of the German case and very little of the British, and determined to invite some English man of letters to visit them. It would be impossible to find any one better qualified than Prof. Murray for this delicate and important mission. He has the intellectual gifts, the ready sympathy and the charm of manner, which will command universal honour and respect. He is also a convinced supporter of our case in the war on grounds of the loftiest moral idealism. Without that his presence would do far more harm than good. A neutral Englishman, or one who thinks more of peace than of the claims of justice and freedom, would have no claim to represent us. International friendship is a valuable thing, and we are anxious to have a good understanding with all neutral countries, but it must be without any sacrifice of our integrity. To present the moral issue as something clear, convincing, and imperative, without any trimming of our sails, is the only way either to deserve or to win success.

A well attended meeting in support of the "Fight for Right Movement" was held on February 25 in the Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hall, Hampstead. The Rev. Henry Gow presided, and the speakers included Sir Francis Younghusband and Mrs. Stuart Moore (Miss Evelyn Underhill). Sir Francis Younghusband referred specially to the fine tradition of honourable dealing and respect for the rights of others which is the secret of the success of British administration. In this war our former enemies had become our enthusiastic allies. All this he felt was at stake in the war, which had been brought about by the brutal assertion of the contrary doctrine that might is right. Mrs. Stuart Moore pleaded in a simple and convincing way for the life of consecration, in which the strength of our devotion to our cause would be revealed by the daily discipline which we imposed upon our own lives. A subsequent speaker, referring to the selfishness of the attitude of those who claimed to live their own lives without honouring the claims of national duty, referred to a pacifist sect in Russia, whose members, acknowledging that some resistance was necessary to the terror of the German invasion, resolved to inflict the stain of fighting upon their own souls rather than impose it on others. This is a parable of escape from the self-centred life, with its timid scruples, into the heroism of self abandonment, which has many applications nearer home.

The death of Henry James is a distinct loss to literature, for he was a man of sensitive and delicate gifts, though they hardly amounted to genius. It is, of course, too soon to try to assign him his rank among English novelists, though we doubt whether posterity will pay much attention to his books. His intricate style, which corresponded to the strange meanderings of his analytical thought, is a stumbling-block to most readers. And rightly so. Anything which it is worth while to write in English can be expressed in English which all people of good taste will be glad to read. Most of the eulogies of him which have appeared in the Press bear the mark upon them of the clever disciple, and were probably written before recent events had shattered our literary affectations and inspired us with a glorious impatience of fads and coteries. We can admire his gifts, and the conscientiousness with which he plied his craft, without calling him a great artist; for great art has as its basis what is simple and universal in its appeal. It belongs not to the sect of the clever but to the world.

There will be a widespread feeling of regret among our readers at the news of the death of Miss Dorothea Hollins. To some of us she was a personal friend; to many more she was a writer who had charmed them by the brightness of her visions and the beauty of her verse. In the tribute which Mr. Wood pays to her memory in our columns to-day he speaks for us all. We remember her for her delight in music and art and noble literature, but still more for her ideals of a better social order and her devotion to the cause of womanhood, which made her the friend of working-girls and the keen and generous ally of those who are toiling to make the conditions of labour for women better everywhere.

THE RELIGIOUS PRESS AND THE PRESENT CRISIS

Has the religious Press any special function to perform at the present time? There are apparently some people who think that it would do well to fence itself off from the noise and tumult of the world and devote itself to its own quiet concerns. The churches must still attend to their domestic affairs; religious thought is independent of the whirlpool of politics or the fortunes of battle;—and these it is contended are its special ground. Why should it occupy itself with week-day events and allow itself to become obsessed with the war to the detriment of higher interests? There is in pleas of this kind, if not a survival of the old hard division between the sacred and the secular, at anyrate a claim that religion is meant to give us rest and has more to do with the invisible world of beautiful ideas than with the hard facts of daily life. It comes dangerously near to exalting the life of meditation above the life of obedience, at a time when self-sacrifice has become a practical creed and the chief virtues of the Christian character shine with greater splendour on the battlefield than in the church. It is because the war is not merely a vast welter of human misery calling for our pity and help, but a spiritual conflict between good and evil, an apocalypse of pain through which God is laying bare the moral foundations of human life, that men cannot forget it even in their prayers.

But the religious Press has to deal with these affairs in a way of its own. That is its high and difficult privilege. It is no mere chronicle of current opinions and passing events. Its comments and its judgments should be determined by the verdicts of an awakened conscience and a desire to look at everything in its relation to the manifest will of God. It is in this way that it can serve the national purpose best. Fortunately, many writers in the daily Press have been imbued with the same spirit. Many leading articles in The Daily Telegraph and The Westminster Gazette, and Mr. Clutton-Brock's 'Thoughts on the War' in the Literary Supplement of The Times, to name only a few conspicuous examples, have done much to keep their readers high-minded and hopeful, with their feet firmly planted on the rock amid the swelling of the sea. There is, however, unceasing need of the weekly religious message as well, and it certainly does not grow less as the struggle increases in intensity, and personal anxieties grow thicker around us, and the physical horrors of warfare almost blind us to the nobility of our duty.

We do not doubt, for instance, that we went into this war with clean hands and noble aims. None of us wanted it, and no man whose opinion is worth consideration has ever suggested an alternative course. It was the only possible path of national virtue and self-respect. But it is not enough to remember this occasionally. It must be a constant thought with us, and determine our attitude every moment of every day. Many of us have not much staying power unless we receive encouragement from others. Under the pressure of personal sorrows and public disappointments we find ourselves growing critical and fretful. Some of us are even betrayed into the peevish remark that we are tired of the war, not because we think it wrong, but because we do not like it, and under its shadow life is losing much of its attractiveness. It is in this way that a long struggle tests our principles. We must renew our vow of dedication continually, and apply our conviction of rightness to all the changing fortunes of the fight, and to every personal sacrifice which we have to make for its sake in our home life and our personal habits. It is our plain duty to help one another to keep the noble crusading spirit untarnished to the end, not only for the sake of our sons and brothers in the trenches but also as a simple act of loyalty to God.

There are also temptations which often take us unawares, and difficulties which must be solved not by the hot desires of the moment but by the calm exercise of a trained moral judgment. This duty to which we have been called is full of danger. It is dangerous to physical life, and it is equally dangerous to our soul's. Devotion to a cause does not always protect us from hatred of our enemies. Severe provocation may betray us into an appetite for reprisals. Familiarity with the slaughter and destructiveness of war may gradually dull the finer sensibilities of our nature and reduce us to a mood of weak and unprotesting acceptance. Almost every week there is something which calls for warning or reproof, or at least for a clear and dispassionate attempt to distinguish between right and wrong. There are also all the unsolved problems incident to a strange world. We have never travelled this way before, and many a step has to be taken in defiance of rules and prejudices just because there is some deep instinct of rightness within. It is over this territory with its hidden pitfalls that religion must keep an unsleeping vigilance. There is no moment at which it can withdraw its guard with safety, for this conflict cuts so deep into personal life and has worked such revolutionary changes in public affairs, that it affects every part of our duty. The future of organised religion in this country depends in no small degree upon the humility with which it seeks to understand an unfamiliar situation, and the moral energy which it throws into the task of grappling with the real facts of the world.

Let us also remember that it is the suffering and need created by the war which provide religious men with the finest opportunities of unselfish service at the present time. We cannot keep silence about them or pretend to forget them. Their appeal is as suitable for our prayers as for our week-day discussions. But there are special reasons why our religious journals should devote a great deal of their energy to the work of fostering and guiding the spirit of generosity. The first wave of public sympathy has spent its force. Appeals in the daily Press often fall upon deaf ears. People are beginning to be anxious about their own incomes and find that it costs them more to be kind. But Christian charity is not a fair-weather virtue, and we need to have its claims pressed upon us as something that is inseparable from any loyal following of Christ. It is only by a complete union of heart and spirit with the sufferings of this present time that we can preserve our own faith in the Divine Pity. We must bear all the pain and sacrifice which God lays upon us, without murmuring and without respite. Morning by morning He opens our ears to the most searching word which He has ever spoken to us. If we do not listen we shall seek in vain for any other open revelation of His Will.

Here then are topics and duties sufficient to enlist all our energies. Let it not be said of us, because we have tried to the best of our ability to illumine the meaning and press home the obligations of these tragic days, that we are bemused and obsessed by the war. Obsession implies a state of mind in which a man becomes the victim of a single idea and loses the harmony and balance of his judgment. To that we cannot plead guilty, for we have always written, at least, with deliberation, with a keen sense of responsibility and a genuine desire to rise above the passions of the hour. It has been our aim to speak a message of confidence and encouragement, to disentangle some of the deeper spiritual meanings of the struggle, and to help men to carry the burden of their duty in the spirit of heroes to the end. If we have failed, or some tone of depression or anxiety has crept unbidden into our pages, the fault lies with ourselves and not with the timeliness and wisdom of our aim. And the moral of it is not that we should forget the war, and turn the attention of our readers to other things, but that we should gird up the loins of our mind and remember it henceforth in a right and noble way.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Mysterious Night! when our first parent knew
Thee from report divine, and heard thy name,
Did he not tremble for this lovely frame,
This glorious canopy of light and blue?
Yet 'neath a curtain of translucent dew,
Bathed in the rays of the great setting flame,
Hesperus with his host of heaven came,
And lo! Creation widened in man's view.
Who could have thought such darkness lay concealed Within thy beams, O Sun! or who could find
Whilst flow'r and leaf and insect stood revealed
That to such countless orbs thou mad'st us blind!
Why do we then shun Death with anxious strife?
If Light can thus deceive, wherefore not Life?

Joseph Blanco White.

The first feeling that we have on entering a church is one of peace and repose. The world is in such a hurry, and is moving, as some people tell us, so much faster than formerly, that we seem to want a few minutes of rest, an occasional breathing time before we go hence. We desire to be with God, as we believe that we shall hereafter be with Him. Here, at any rate, the strife of tongues is hushed, the strain of mind is taken off, the cares of life are no longer immediately present to us: "There is a great calm." Here we pause for a moment in our journey that we may proceed refreshed. Here we are raised above the mean thoughts of mankind; we hear the words of the saints and prophets of old; we live for a short time in the nearer companionship of God and of another world; we pass in review the last day or two, and ask ourselves whether we are doing enough for others; we seek to realise in our minds a higher standard of duty and character. Here are revived in us those aspirations after another and better state of being, which in good men are always returning and are never completely satisfied, but which, like wings, bear us up on the sea of life, and prevent our sinking into the routine of custom which prevails around us. Here we resign ourselves to the pure thought, to the pure will, to the pure mind, which is the truer part of our own souls, and in which and through which we see God. Benjamin Jowett.

O THOU who art our Helper, the Mighty One who respectest not the persons of men, be Thou the help of all Thy people. Thou art our Fortress and Defender, and none can pluck us out of Thy hand. There is none other God like unto Thee; in Thee is our trust. Sanctify us through Thy Truth. Thy Word is truth. Preserve us and all Thy people from all injury and deceit, from the fear of the enemy, from the arrow that flieth by day, and the mischief that walketh in darkness, and vouchsafe unto us the eternal life which is in Christ, Thy Son. Amen.

DR. DANIEL WILLIAMS AND HIS TRUST.

III.

The Library.

In the first of his articles on the Trust founded by Dr. Williams Mr. Herford has outlined the clause in the will relating to the Library, and has traced the early history of the old building in Red Cross Street, and the uses to which it was put.

It may help us to a clearer understanding of the doctor's intentions with regard to the library if we examine the clause in rather more detail. After giving instructions as to the disposal of duplicates, &c., purchase of an edifice "in some cheap and convenient place," and appointment of a librarian, it proceeds:—

"Two catalogues shall be kept, one by the keeper of the library, one by such as the trustees shall name of their own number (wherein any other person's gift of books may be inserted, under them the names of such donors as shall add to the said library): and the said trustees shall pay ten pounds per annum to the said library-keeper (a young preacher seems fittest for it), giving security for his fidelity and attendance in such times as they appoint. But if no fit edifice can be procured, then a small piece of ground shall be bought, and a building erected for this purpose, not pompous or too large....And the said trustees are to keep the said bought or built edifice in repair, and at due times a fire to preserve the said books."

Defoe in his 'Memoirs of the Life of Dr. Williams,' published anonymously in 1718, says, "I have been told that the Doctor design'd to recommend it to the Dissenters to leave legacies to the said Library, either in Books or Money, to buy such new and valuable Books as shall come out after his Decease....which recommendation, if it be followed, may in time render this the compleatest Library in Britain."

One does not wish to be unfair to the Founder, and certainly there is something large-minded, though somewhat vague and indefinite, about the expression "a public library." On the other hand, the minute detail as to the two catalogues, the fire "at due times," the recommendation of a throwster's (i.e., a silk-twister's) workhouse, the meagre pittance allowed the library-keeper, and the absence of any provision for growth apart from casual gifts, make it hard to believe that any development such as that suggested by Defoe was contemplated by Dr. Williams.

However that may be, the Trustees, at any rate, seized upon the idea of a "public library," decided that no "fit edifice" could be procured, erected, and in part paid for out of their own pockets, a building (opened to the public in 1729), which, if not exactly "pompous," was certainly, judged by the Founder's instructions, "too large"; and while building operations were in progress, not only compiled but printed a catalogue (1727) of the original Library in the hope that other "munificent and public-spirited persons and lovers of literature might be excited to contribute to its augmentation."

No praise is too high for the Trustees at this period. Severely handicapped by want of funds they set themselves to the apparently impossible task of keeping the Library alive. They established a custom, amounting almost to a rule, by which every lay Trustee on his election gave a donation of £10 for the purchase of books; many of the clerical Trustees made handsome bequests from their own libraries, and there was a fair, but by no means considerable, response to the various appeals for donations from without.

Meanwhile, the edifice, as Mr. Herford has already pointed out, was not only "kept in repair," but was put to very considerable use, and became for a whole century the headquarters of the Three Denominations. It was to this circumstance that the building in Red Cross Street owed its celebrity and importance, much more than to the fact that it housed a comparatively small library accessible to a limited public.

Towards the end of the eighteenth century it was felt by the Trustees that some drastic steps should be taken to call the attention of the public to the needs of the Library. Accordingly in the year 1793 a special Committee was appointed on whose recommendation a three-page leaflet was drawn up for distribution. After remarking upon the absence of any provision for growth under the Founder's will, it continues:—

"It cannot reasonably be questioned but that it would be honourable to the Dissenters, and conducive to the interests of Literature among them, that a Public Library, chiefly, though not exclusively appropriated to their use, should consist of a numerous Collection of valuable and well-chosen books.... It is, therefore, much to be desired that those liberal-minded persons who may be inclined to promote an augmentation of the Library should make such donations for the purpose as they may judge proper."

The use of the term "Dissenters," which was conspicuously absent from the clause in the will, is specially noticeable, and leads one to consider how far the name "Dissenters' Library," frequently applied during the eighteenth century, was a fair one.

Though nothing is stated precisely in the will, it seems probable that the Founder had in his mind an institution which should be to the Dissenters what Sion College was to the clergy of the Established Church, though the wide permission "whereto such as my Trustees appoint shall have access," shows that it was not the intention of the Founder, as it was never the practice of the Trustees, to limit the use of the Library to the Dissenters. For all that it is undeniable that during the whole of the eighteenth century the circle to which the Library appealed was, for one reason or another, a very narrow one. As early as the end of the year 1731, the strict undenominationalism of the Founder's instruction was qualified by the order "That all Pastors and settled Assistants of the three Denominations of Dissenters.... be admitted a constant use of the Library according to the Rules." The foundation, in 1753, of the British Museum and the transference to that institution, in 1759, of the copyright privilege attached to the Royal Library, struck a death blow at the older unendowed and unprivileged foundation, considered as a "public library." But the appeal is always, in principle at least, to the wider public. We see it in the circular of 1793, which speaks of "such Authors, whether Dissenters or others, as may be inclined to increase the Library"; we see it again in the rules prefixed to the Catalogue of 1801, where the special privilege afforded to pastors of the three denominations is withdrawn; it appears in the preface to the catalogue of 1841, which speaks of the Library as "open without distinction to persons of all classes and parties."

And yet throughout the whole of this period the evidence of the 'Register of Books Borrowed' all goes to show how small was the use made of the Library by the general public. Dr. Towers, Dr. Aikin, Mr. Barbauld, the names repeat themselves with wearisome monotony. If we look for the cause of this we shall find it clearly put in a letter dated December 10, 1838, addressed by Mr. James Yates to his fellow Trustees, in which he suggests the transference of the main bulk of the books to the British Museum, and the conversion of the Library from a general to a special collection, devoting itself to some one specific department of learning. "With regard to the contents of the Library," writes Mr. Yates, "it appears to me to be a collection of the most indefinite and miscellaneous character; and yet not of a character suited to answer the only end which can be supposed to be contemplated under its present management, viz., the supply of useful and agreeable matter for reading to the Trustees and their families and friends." Perhaps Mr. Yates had been examining the Register, and had seen that on September 20 of this very year "Mrs. Godwin, by order of John Taylor, Esq.," had borrowed 'Culpepper's London Dispensatory' and 'Cogan's Haven of Health'!

It is only just to point out that in the same year Benjamin Hanbury, then engaged upon his 'Historical Memorials relating to the Independents and Congregationalists,' was not only referring to but borrowing such books as Paget's 'Answer to the Complaints of Will. Best,' 1635; Bradshaw's 'English Puritanisme,' 1641; and Morton's 'New England's Memorial,' 1669, books which could probably not have been borrowed from any other library in the kingdom; while, in the previous year, Mr. W. H. Black, the well-known Seventh-Day Baptist, was able to borrow vols. i. and ii. of Crosby's 'History of the Baptists' on the order of Mr. Yates himself. Such cases are, however, the exception rather than the rule. A library which was opened with a miscellaneous collection of about ten thousand volumes, and which, at the time of its centenary, contained less that seventeen thousand, was not likely to attract the general reading public. Even these meagre accessions were the result, not of careful selection, but for the most part of promiscuous charity. The "Dissenters' Library" had to wait till 1774 before it possessed a copy of Calamy's 'Ejected Ministers,' published in the years 1713–27, and even then was indebted to the chance generosity of an unknown donor.

The 'Visitors' Book' tells the same tale as the 'Book of Benefactors' and the 'Register of Books Borrowed.' Occasionally we find the name of some interesting stranger, such as Nathaniel Hawthorne, who visited the Library on July 12, 1859; historians of Nonconformity, such as Prof. Lorimer, Dr. Waddington, Dr. McCrie, and Dr. Dexter were fairly frequent visitors, often coming several times in quick succession when engaged upon some particular question on which the Library treasures could throw light.

But all three books suggest not a live concern, but an ancient and venerable institution, valuable on account of a certain number of rare old volumes contained in it, and not easily to be found elsewhere.

Looking back we may be thankful that nothing came of Mr. Yates's suggestion or of the similar proposal made from the side of the British Museum by Sir Anthony Panizzi in 1863. But at the time one must admit that there was much to be said for them.

Meanwhile, other forces were coming into play. The income of the Trust had largely increased, so that in 1805 and again in 1830 the Court of Chancery was able to authorize the application of certain portions of the annual surplus to the purchase of books. This annual grant, small at first, but gradually increased, marks the beginning of a new era in the history of the Library.

It was followed in 1864 by an even more important event, already mentioned by Mr. Herford in his first article, viz., the purchase of the building in Red Cross Street by the Metropolitan Railway Co., and the removal of the Library to Bloomsbury. Before we take our leave of this first home of the Trust it may be worth while to attempt some picture of it. Mr. Jeremy describes it as containing "two large committee rooms, a noble reception room of fine proportions, well suited for public meetings, together with a capacious room for the Library, besides house-keeper's rooms." There is a fine air of old-fashioned dignity about the room for the Library, as show in the old print. It is not so lofty as the present reading-room, having only a few feet between the ceiling and the tall massive cases, standing out, as at present, so as to form a succession of bays. At the far end is a fireplace with handsome overmantel, and there, in the place of honour, hangs the portrait of the Founder, flanked, as to-day, by the portraits of Mrs. Williams and her first husband. There, too, are the two pedestal reading-desks, which carried the catalogues till a few months ago.

Those were the days when Thomas Hollis, republican, dilettante, generous patron of all who fought the battles of civil and religious liberty through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, would stroll into the Library and leave there one of those countless gifts which, modestly concealed behind the phrase "By an unknown hand," adorn the pages of the 'Book of Benefactors' as richly as his beautiful and famous bindings adorn the shelves of the older part of the Library to-day.

It is pleasant to pause for a moment and look back into this haunt of ancient peace. In a subsequent article we shall hope to give some account of the general scope of the Library and of the treasures which it contains.

HOW BELGIUM STOOD THE TEST.

It is the moment of crisis that reveals the true character of a people as of an individual, and a story has recently been published showing how Belgium met her hour of destiny eighteen months ago and emerged a heroine among the nations. An article by a Belgian dignitary, which appeared in the Revue des deux Mondes, was reproduced last week in the Indépendance Belge, and gives a deeply interesting account of the critical hours of Sunday, August 2, 1914, and the two succeeding days.

On that Sunday afternoon all was comparatively calm in Brussels, the 3 o'clock editions of the papers had come out with an assurance given by the German minister that Belgian neutrality would be respected, and the news spread a feeling of relief among the people. But those who were more behind the scenes were uneasy, they knew that no official reply had been given by Germany to England's question sent two days before, asking for an assurance that Belgium's integrity would be upheld. France's assurance, full and unequivocal, had come the day before, but Germany was still silent.

At half-past seven the tall figure of the German minister was seen striding into the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, and after a few minutes disappeared again into the street. The bolt had fallen—Germany demanded a right of passage for her army across Belgian soil! Ministers began to assemble, and the terms of the note were read to them. "A silence, a long and tragic silence of several minutes," says our writer, "followed the reading. For the first time we had heard the words of this infamous ultimatum, and we were thinking. ....In the mind of each one of us rose tender memories of our beloved country, so sweet, so tranquil; and then arose, maybe, a haunting sense of the horrors that were awaiting her; but what dominated all our thoughts was unquestionably the fixed determination to be worthy of our forefathers in their hours of trial." "It is with a feeling of pride," he adds, "that I can truly assert that not for one moment did any one of us hesitate as to the answer which we should give to Germany—a blank refusal."

Meanwhile, Brussels knew nothing of what was in store for her. Our writer, passing out into the street, found the people chatting in the restaurants, gay and happy. He himself felt crushed by the weight of the secret which he was carrying, the secret which would be revealed the next day, and would bring such a rude awakening to all around him.

The Council of Ministers met that same evening under the presidency of the King. It began at 9 and did not rise till nearly 4 A.M. While it was sitting one of the principal officers of State occupied himself with preparing a draft reply, and it is a remarkable testimony to the unity of spirit pervading all Belgians at this hour that, when the ministers had concluded their meeting and went through the draft, they hardly had to alter a single word.

The next day (Monday) an official from the British Embassy called to hear the terms of the reply. "The Belgian Government, if it accepted the proposals that have been made to it, would sacrifice the honour of the nation and would at the same time betray its duty towards Europe." "As I read these words," says our author, "I felt a lump in my throat, and I nearly broke down; but I managed to read it through to the end." The Englishman stood by him without moving, then he grasped both his hands, looked into his face, and said, "Bravo, Belgium."

"Bravo, Belgium!" Is not that what every Englishman still feels in his heart as he thinks of the little country which faced overpowering odds and sacrificed herself to save Europe?

The following day (Tuesday) the Belgian Parliament met at 10 o'clock. Half an hour before news had come through that the Germans had crossed the frontier, and excitement was at its height. Crowds poured into the streets, flags floated from every window, and expectation was intense. Hardly had the clock struck when a tumultuous cheer rose into the air. The King had left his palace. On horseback, in simple uniform, his face pale but with composed expression, he advanced through the streets amid enthusiastic shouts of "Long live the King!" "Long live Belgium!" When he dismounted and entered the Parliament building the scene was almost indescribable. The deputies crowded towards him with eager faces and outstretched hands as though to testify, perhaps for the last time, their devotion to the cause of the nation.

"Those who were present," says our writer, "will never forget it, and there were few who would not have to admit that tears came to their eyes as the King passed by."

A few hours later the news of Belgium's heroism had travelled across the channel, and England, answering the call, stepped forth to champion her cause and to join her in fighting for the freedom of Europe.

NATIONAL ECONOMY AND BREWING.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—In your last issue you refer to the hardship involved in depriving newspapers of a third of their paper while the materials for making beer were left untouched. Very few people realise what enormous quantities of foodstuffs are used in the manufacture of alcoholic drinks, viz., about 100 million tons annually. In times of peace and plenty such destruction of the food of the country should call for much more serious thought than it has hitherto received; how much more so at the present time when economy is forced upon us by a long and costly war, and when the production of food has been decreased? The matter would be serious enough were the grain, sugar, &c., used to make a harmless beverage, but when the result is a drink which makes for degradation and inefficiency, a drink upon which a yearly sum of something like 160 million pounds is spent directly, and probably about the same amount indirectly, a drink the sale of which has to be greatly restricted when the country is called upon for its utmost efficiency, surely we shall be foolish, indeed, if we fail to give the whole subject the serious attention it demands. I have said nothing as to the labour involved in the transport of the materials, the brewing, distilling, and distribution of the drink. The Chairman of the Cunard Steamship Co. states that thirty thousand tons a week of barley and other produce are brought into this country for "the Trade," and that thirty-six thousand tons of coal have to be sent every week to the breweries and distilleries.—Yours, &c.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MISS DOROTHEA HOLLINS.

It is with great regret we record the death of Miss Dorothea Hollins at her home in Chelsea on Thursday, February 24. Miss Hollins was a well-known woman of letters, a poet of no mean order, and an earnest social worker, especially interested in the lot of women and children. She was a frequent contributor to this journal; it is only three weeks ago that a singularly beautiful letter of hers, written in pencil, on what proved to be her death bed, appeared in our columns—a letter which revealed her gratitude to her spiritual ancestry in what she called "the older Unitarianism," and her adhesion to its ideals.

Endowed with abilities of a very high order, which had been carefully cultivated by training, travel, and a wide knowledge of men and books, Miss Hollins threw herself with ardour into literary work. Her early novel, 'The Marriage of True Minds,' revealed a temperament at once mystical and philosophical, yet full of warmth and human nature. Her subsequent works, mostly volumes of poetry, deepened the impression she made of a pure, delicate, sensitive soul, touched with the light of heaven and brimming over with human sympathy. In the 'Herbs of Medea,' 'The Seven Wayfarers,' and, above all, in a long and noble pageant poem, 'The Quest,' she gave the world her finest aspirations, winning to herself hosts of friends. Her artistic sensibilities found a second sphere in music, both as a composer and a pianist. Later on she became deeply interested in social questions, and her last little book of lyrics, 'Songs of Labour,' told of her sympathy with all workers for social betterment, and with the widespread hope of a fairer social day. While her poems never achieved great popularity, she was accepted by all the best authorities as one of the divine company of singers. The Times reviewer said of her work :—"Whether in lyric or blank verse or sonnet it often achieves a flawlessness of rhythm and diction which is rare, and it always voices a true emotion."

Troubled much at one time with perplexing questions concerning the great problems of soul and destiny, she bravely fought her doubts, and won her way through much pain to assurance and peace. She found the truth in Dante's well-known line :—

La sua volontrada e' nostre pace.

A line which became afterwards her motto and guiding star.

Naturally of a somewhat diffident and reserved nature, she responded quickly and gratefully to every kindly encouragement of appreciation and sympathy. All who met her became impressed by her sincerity, simplicity—a sincerity clear as light, and a simplicity as of a little child. She possessed in her life as in her poems the qualities of high seriousness, artistic restraint, and a deeply Christian spirit. J. W.

The funeral took place very quietly on February 28. After a service in her house conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood the body was cremated at Golder's Green. Subsequently the ashes were taken to Mansfield to be placed in the family grave.

HOME CAMP NOTES.

Where men are in camp it is comparatively easy to meet with those you are seeking, especially as the authorities everywhere show the utmost willingness to assist inquiries. It is more difficult to locate billets, because that involves first of all getting a plan of the town, then fewer men can be seen during the meal hour, company offices must be visited in case of failure, and half a dozen directions may have to be tried before you arrive. A social gathering, therefore, when it can be arranged, serves not only the useful purpose of making the men acquainted with each other, but also saves time, and enables the visitor to use the only means at his disposal of meeting some of the men.

In one of these billeting towns a dozen men were living in an empty house. One of them was on my list. He attended a Nonconformist chapel, the minister of which urged the young fellows to join the church of their own faith in their own town before they left for the front. Private D. was married to a member of one of our northern schools, he had attended some of the services at the old chapel, and now he wished to act on the advice of the minister before he went "across." Could I make him into a Unitarian? The request was a little startling and unusual, and for the moment I was nonplussed. Because what was this church that he desired? Had it a corporate fellowship into which a man could be ushered unceremoniously—in an empty house? Would the admission be valid? Would it mean anything? How could there be "a church" when we knew only churches priding themselves on their individuality? Would any one object to one minister saying a word of welcome on behalf of the whole body of these churches? And yet I could not say, "Friend, there is no Unitarian church, we have nothing to meet your case." It was necessary to give him the right hand of fellowship, to declare him a member of that church—and take the consequences. Long years ago I baptised the dying child of some Roman Catholic parents, who assured me that its soul would be saved if I did as they wished even if I were only a theological student. It seemed to me what I was asked for now was a much less serious and a far happier happening, and that if so much could be done for the dying this little might be done without offence for the living. I don't know what the Roman Church thought of what was done for the child; but the sympathy of our own people must surely be with the desire of the young soldier who will go to the war happier in his mind because the request was granted. I have since sent to the minister of the church where the wife worships the name of this new adherent, asking that he would confirm my action by adding the name to the church roll there. Some day I may hear that it was all right.

There are lonely tracts in the soldier's life even under the best conditions. In the midst of the great snows last week men talked, with a feeling like hunger, of home. Only to meet them is to know that the ministry which matters is the ministry of sympathy and fellowship.

I recall an hour in the pack-room of a military hospital. Every day, in relays, men coming for sick treatment called at this basement office to deposit their field outfit in exchange for a suit of hospital blue—the colour which the country knows now best after khaki. One of our men was a keeper of this store. For over a year he has been making inventories for these sick, rolling up the kit, and noting especially the package of personal treasures, letters, photos, and the like, so that one day when the health sheet is clean the things the patient values most shall not be missing. But the monotony of it! Besides this yearly round of folding parcels, "forming fours" is a mild sort of excitement. To the packer as well as to the patient any diversion is welcome. In the same day I have had men who were not on my list ask if they might have a word with me; one because he had heard that I came from his native town, the other that he belonged to the place where I had spent twenty years of a happy ministry. Incidentally, too, it is surprising the number of men who are glad to pass a word when they know one is a Unitarian. "Oh no, I am not a Unitarian, but I took a prize in that school" so many years ago; or another, "No, but my best friends go to your place," and again, "I think that way myself, and I should be one if I were anything." The voice from the "outside" is welcome to them all. It is doubly so to the men with whom you claim any kinship of faith, and especially if you know their own chapel or school, and any of the folk connected with it. We turn ourselves to that which recalls the familiar and beloved. The sight of an English face after many days in the strange land thrills you, or the flag starts the generous tears after your exile. The new life teaches new values. The agony of the voyager on a great ship at a port of call, when he alone has not a soul to wave a farewell from the shore, will change a nature.

I wondered what were the thoughts of many minds one night not long ago. Ten thousand men or more passed in absolute silence beneath my window in a tiny town. They went past for hours and never the sound of a voice was heard. But who could sleep among it? Time and again I went to the window and watched. I called "Good-night, friend," but silence would have been better. What were they thinking as they passed on into the darkness, each man alone with his own folk—in the spirit.

So I am not surprised at the atmosphere in our little meetings here and there, and up and down the land. There was one not long ago that is typical. As usual there was an impromptu programme, and songs were forthcoming in abundance. But no one volunteered a comic item. A friendly sergeant looked in and gave us 'A Warrior Bold,' and time and again we turned back to 'Keep the Home fires burning till the boys come home.' While refreshments were being served one of our friends handed round the copies of 'On the March,' which I carry with me. This little booklet, compiled by Rev. W. E. George of Derby, is one of the best of its kind, and I am allowed as many copies as are needed. When the programme should have been resumed the only thing that was wanted was that the hymns in the little book should be sung, and after 'Lead Kindly Light' and 'Nearer my God to Thee,' I was asked to read the prayers on duty, and some others. And in that way we came to the close of a social gathering that, at the instance of the men themselves, had really become a deeply religious meeting.

Those who read of the service conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood recently will be interested to hear that on Sunday night last the first of a series of monthly services was conducted in the Nonconformist Hut in the camp, "amongst the firs and snows." I wish also to acknowledge the receipt of ten shillings from Lieut. Bounds, and of a sovereign from Miss Swaine of Guildford, and I shall be glad of any other contributions in aid of the social side of this work that may be sent to me at Essex Hall.

Thos. P. Spedding.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND THE QUAKERS.

A letter by Abraham Lincoln to Miss Eliza P. Gurney of Burlington, N.J., has been published in The Boston Sunday Herald. Miss Gurney was a Quaker, and headed a peace movement during the Civil War. The letter is as follows:—

Executive Mansion,
Washington, Sept. 4, 1864.

Eliza P. Gurney:

My Esteemed Friend,—I have not forgotten—probably shall never forget—the very impressive occasion when yourself and friend visited me on a Sabbath forenoon two years ago. Nor has your kind letter, written nearly a year later. ever been forgotten. In all, it has been your purpose to strengthen my reliance in God.

I am much indebted to the good Christian people of the country for their constant prayers and consolations, and to none of them more than to yourself. The purposes of the Almighty are perfect and must prevail, though we erring mortals may fail to accurately perceive them in advance. We hoped for a happy termination of this terrible war long before this; but God knows best and has ruled otherwise. We shall yet acknowledge His wisdom and our own error therein. Meanwhile we must work earnestly in the best light He gives us, trusting that so working still conduces to the great end He ordains.

Surely He intends some great good to follow this mighty convulsion, which no mortal could make and no mortal could stay.

Your people, the Friends, have had and are having a very great trial. On principle and faith opposed to both war and oppression, they can only practically oppose oppression by war. In this hard dilemma some have chosen one horn and some the other. For those appealing to me on conscientious grounds I have done and shall do the best I could and can, in my own conscience, under my oath to the law. That you believe this I doubt not; and believing it I shall still receive, for our country and myself, your earnest prayers to our Father in heaven. Your sincere friend,

A. Lincoln.

"The letter has been preserved in a photographic copy by Mr. William H. Storr, a photographer of Burlington, N.J. "Eliza Gurney," he says, "cherished the letter as one of her greatest treasures. I remember that when she brought it to my studio to be copied she sat right beside it while I arranged the camera, as if afraid it might suddenly disappear."

A meeting to promote the purposes of The Fight for Right Movement will be held at the Mansion House on Monday, March 13, at 3 p.m. The Lord Mayor will take the chair, and among the speakers will be Mr. Andrew Fisher, High Commissioner for Australia, the Bishop of Winchester, Mr. Donald Maclean, M.P., the Chief Rabbi, Dr. L. P. Jacks, Sir Edward Beauchamp, the Hon. Treasure of the movement, and others.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—The 811th and Annual Meeting of the Monthly Meeting of Ministers was held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Tuesday, February 29, when the following members were present: Messrs. Clare, Graham, Hawkins, Johnson, Shelley, Short, Thomas, Topping, Warnock, Whiteman, and Wrigley. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas took the chair at 3.15 p.m. After hymn and prayer the Secretary read the Report and Balance Sheet for the year 1915-16. The Rev. Isaac Wrigley was re-elected secretary and treasurer, and the Rev. Leonard Short was appointed auditor for 1916-17. At the close of business the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., spoke for about an hour on the subject 'With the Troops in France.' The members afterwards adjourned to tea, kindly provided by the wardens and friends of the Old Meeting Church.

Coventry: Re-opening Services.—On Saturday, February 19, the Great Meeting House (Unitarian), Smithford Street, Coventry, was re-opened, after complete restoration, and many improvements. Dr. Chas. Hargrove preached in the afternoon to a good congregation. Tea was served at 5.30 to over a hundred members and friends. Soon after 7 o'clock a public meeting was held in the chapel. Mr. Byng Kenrick, of Birmingham, presided, supported by the Revs. Dr. Hargrove, T. P. Spedding, Lawrence Clare, L. Short (the minister), George Bainton, and Messrs. Ronald P. Jones, M.A. (architect) and C. C. Johnson. The Chairman congratulated the congregation upon the complete success of their renovation scheme. In an interesting speech he reminded his hearers of the brave men who for conscience' sake were ejected from their livings in 1662, two of whom, Dr. Obadiah Grew, Vicar of St. Michael's, and Dr. John Bryan, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Coventry, were the founders of the Great Meeting House in Coventry. From these men and their descendants the present members had received an inheritance of pure religion and free worship. He urged them to put the same spirit into their church life as their forbears had done, and future success would be assured. The Secretary, Mr. C. C. Johnson, in a clear statement, told the story of the Great Meeting House during the last few years. He spoke of an unsuccessful attempt some time ago at renovation. But out of this a balance of some twenty odd pounds remained and formed the nucleus of the present fund. Since September last, by subscriptions from members, local and outside friends, and by the untiring efforts of the minister, the fund had reached over £600. On behalf of the congregation he thanked the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. Ronald P. Jones, and Mr. W. Byng Kenrick for sympathetic and valuable financial assistance, and Mr. Jones also for professional help and advice as architect. Mr. Ronald P. Jones, who had a very cordial reception, expressed his entire satisfaction with the work carried out, and impressed upon the congregation the fact that in the Great Meeting House they had a very fine specimen of the Religious Meeting House of over two hundred years ago. After some interesting remarks upon church architecture, Mr. Jones announced the welcome news that Mr. Charles Hawksley, of London, had promised £50 to the fund. He heartily congratulated the members upon the success of the scheme, and wished minister and people God-speed. The Rev. T. P. Spedding, who had had five months temporary charge of the congregation before Mr. Short s appointment, conveyed to the meeting the greetings and good wishes of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. He spoke of the happy time which he had spent in Coventry, and was glad he had suggested Mr. Short's name to the congregation. After helpful words from Dr. Hargrove, the Rev. George Bainton, in happy mood, voiced the greetings and good wishes of the local Free Church ministers. The Rev. L. Short said there were to be no formal votes of thanks, but he wished to express the gratitude of his people to all who had helped in the success of the day. He especially desired to thank Mr. Potter and the West Orchard Congregational Church Choir for their splendid singing at that meeting. Speaking of the future of the Great Meeting House, he said it would not have to exist as a mere protest, or simply give expression to negations, but amid all the stupendous waste and sacrifice of life entailed by the war, it would have to bear witness to the great value of the individual; amid the gigantic display of physical force and many materialistic tendencies it would have to bear witness to the life of the spirit, Christ, and God; amid the spending of vast amounts of money, and the accumulation of great fortunes it would have to bear witness to the fact that all wealth was a trust. Admitting his great responsibility as minister of the Great Meeting House, he pointed out that much also depended upon the faithfulness of the members, and with their co-operation all would be well. The meeting closed with the singing of the National Anthem. On Sunday morning and evening Dr. Hargrove preached to good congregations.

Kendal.—The Trustees and congregation of the Market Place Chapel have received with sincere regret the resignation of the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, who will terminate his ministry at Kendal at the end of June.

Liverpool.—The Rathbone Literary Club, which has been a centre of education for the past thirty years, has lately helped to shed light on the present situation by certain notable lectures delivered in Ullet Road Church Hall. The Director of Education in Liverpool (Mr. James G. Legge) spoke in November on 'The Humbling of the Hohenzollerns in 1848'; Dr. Caton on 'The Monks and Monasteries of the Eastern Church'; the High Master of Manchester Grammar School (Mr. J. L. Paton) on 'Germany and the Germans'; and recently Mr. Evan Hughes, Staff Lecturer in Economics for the Liverpool University Extension Board, gave a very valuable address on 'Economic and Social Reconstruction after the War.' He urged the consideration betimes of the state of society which would confront us after the war, for two main reasons: (1) to take means to prevent a state of chaos following demobilisation; and (2) to know and take the necessary measures to make up our colossal losses. The country is at present, he said, consuming stored-up wealth which would have increased its productive capacity; it is using up its fixed capital and selling its foreign securities; it is making loans to other countries; its normal production is much less than before the war; its wealth-makers are in the army and navy, engaged indeed in the great work of necessity, but not producing wealth; its millions at home are in munition factories, hospitals, docks, engaged in supplying, feeding, clothing and nursing the vast army of non-producers, and so themselves no longer reproductive. We are now losing many of our potential producers by death and maiming, and we are going to lose many more after the war by emigration—and all these of our very best stock. We are losing industrial quality through industrial disorganisation, and we have already lost that great part of our foreign trade which covered Germany. The gain is greater than the loss; the economic sacrifice is worth while; but that we should definitely prepare for both short measures, to be taken swiftly, and long period measures after the war is a necessity if we are to have economic salvation. After a survey of social conditions in the nineteenth century, leading up to the state of things which exists at the present time, the lecturer proceeded to outline certain practical measures which would have to be prepared for if industrial chaos at the end of the war was to be avoided—such as the adequate support of the men who come home until employment is found for them, the conversion of the munition factories into centres of production, the retention of unskilled men in the army, where there should be new opportunities of mental and physical improvement, the development of small holdings under the state organisation of land, and the readjustment of labour, so as to ensure that losses are not incurred and wages cut down by the increasing employment of women. We must no longer be a nation of spendthrifts, careless about the development of our resources and the brains of the workers—who are not, the audience were reminded, at all satisfied with things as they are, and would have to be reckoned with. We had to make our people efficient, to pay them adequately, and give more attention to education, business organisation, and the training of human faculties. Above all, the national solidarity must be retained and the class war abolished. The new spirit of fighting shoulder to shoulder must be carried on into peace times, and friendship with the workers must take the place of the old divisions between rich and poor.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The Annual Tea Party was held at Channing Hall on Thursday, 24th ult., the tea being given by Mrs. Wm. Holmes, in order that the proceeds might be devoted to the purchase of material for the War Distress Effort. The Annual Meeting of the Congregation, which was well attended, was held afterwards. Mr. J. R. Wigfull, A.R.I.B.A., occupied the chair. The report showed that, though the church had naturally suffered through the war, its various institutions were in a state of healthy and vigorous activity. The United Sewing Meeting, in connection with the War Effort, had forwarded 3,762 garments and other articles to Army and Navy, &c. For the Chapel Belgian refugee work £500 had been raised; Brandreth House and two cottages were maintained as homes for refugees, and several families had been helped to independence. During the year £50 had been given to the Unity Church Building Fund. Mrs. Sinclair, Miss E. Wilson, Messrs. W. McKinnel, W. R. Barclay, J. W. Bell, and J. H. Fisher were elected to vacant places on the committee. A warm vote of thanks for their ministerial services was accorded to the Rev. C. J. Street, minister, and the Rev. J. W. Lee, assistant minister, on the motion of Mr. W. Holmes, seconded by Mr. W. R. Barclay, and these gentlemen suitably responded. Thanks were also cordially given to the officers, trustees, and committee, on the motion of Mr. W. Sinclair, seconded by Mr. J. W. Bell, and the Hon. Secretary, Mr. Robert Stevenson, acknowledged the vote. A choice musical programme was rendered by Miss E. Cawley, L.R.A.M., Mr. Charles Scholey, and Mr. J. W. Harris, with Mr. B. Jaques as accompanist. Mr. W. G. Turner moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. Holmes, the artistes and the chairman, which was seconded by Mr. J. Figorski.

Bolton.—By the death of Mr. John Lawson, J.P., of Highfield, Sharples, Bank Street Chapel has lost one of its leading members, and many good causes in Bolton an earnest supporter. Mr. Lawson, who was in his 69th year, was treasurer of the Bolton Liberal Association, had been a magistrate for sixteen years, and was one of the oldest trustees of Bank Street Chapel, where his influence will long remain an inspiring memory to his fellow worshippers. At the funeral, which took place on February 21, there was a representative gathering, including members of various local institutions, as well as numerous relatives and friends. A service had been previously held at Bank Street Chapel, when the Rev. J. Cyril Flower gave a sympathetic address. He referred specially to Mr. Lawson's zeal for the work of their mission enterprise, and the loyal help he had given to the cause at Halliwell Road through the difficult days of early struggles, indeed, right up to the end. He was a supporter of all causes which aimed at the social uplifting of the town, and, although devoted to Liberal ideals in politics, was never a mere party nominee, and counted innumerable friends among his political opponents. Mr. Lawson always remained young in spirit, took great delight in the companionship of young people, and by his sympathy and interest very quickly attached to himself the comradeship of the successive ministers with whom he was a fellow worker and worshipper. He believed in the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," and practised that fundamental religious principle in a natural and unostentatious way. The last rites took place at the Crematorium, Chorlton-cum-Hardy, the service being conducted by Mr. Flower.

York.—A new vestry and church parlour were opened recently at St. Saviourgate Chapel, having been built by the Colton Trustees. At a Congregational Social to celebrate the event, Messrs. Lewin, Dodds and Wiseman expressed their pleasure in handing over the property for the use of the congregation. In acceptance, Mr. Beal (Hon. Secretary) and Mr. Currie (Hon. Treasurer) voiced the gratitude of the members and the new hopes raised upon the acquisition of a place of meeting for week-night events. Songs and a dramatic sketch were given by the Young People's Guild. The church organ has been recently overhauled and repaired. A new hymn supplement has been introduced. A satisfactory report and balance sheet were submitted at the Annual Meeting of the congregation, when the President, Secretary, Treasurer and Wardens were re-elected and three ladies were added to the Committee, viz.: Mrs. Atkinson, Miss Elsie Smith, and Miss Gladys Manning. The meeting expressed satisfaction in the appointment of Mr. Hempster as organist and choir-master.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

Rhodes Scholars and the War.

The Rhodes Trust has issued a report, in which it is stated that in 1914–15 nearly all the Colonial undergraduate scholars had entered the Imperial service for the period of the war. In all cases the Trustees had granted leave of absence to such scholars, reserving to them the right to resume their scholarships when they are set free from military service. Only eighteen Colonial scholars continued in residence up to the end of last term. Permission to postpone entrance at Oxford had also been granted to Colonial Scholars elected for 1916, so as to leave them free to respond to the call of national duty. Up to the present time 167 scholars and ex-scholars are known to have taken commissions or enlisted in the Imperial Army and its Colonial contingents. Six of them have lost their lives, several have been wounded, and some are prisoners, whilst one has been awarded the D.S.O., and four the Military Cross. There were eighty-seven American scholars in residence during the whole or part of the year.

Daylight Saving.

In view of the urgent necessity for practising economy at the present time, we might well turn our attention again to the question of daylight saving, which will always be associated with the late Mr. William Willett, though this is essentially one of the cases where an act of Parliament is needed to make the practice a success. The saving in coal and light alone, to say nothing of the benefit to health and spirits which would result from the habit of getting up and going to bed an hour earlier, would be well worth the effort to accommodate ourselves to a readjustment of our daily habits which would probably not be as difficult as it sounds. It has been estimated that the gain to the railways alone through the economy effected in artificial light would be £5,000,000. One of our public schools, Denstone College, has already set the country a good example, and the result is that there is probably no place more difficult to detect after dark from the point of view of a Zeppelin raider. The boys rise at 5.30, breakfast at 6.30, dine at 11.30, take their last meal at 6, and by 7.15 are in bed, with the last dormitory light turned off. The masters, it is said, are guilty of the crime of sitting up until 10 sometimes, but they burn the "midnight oil" so secretly that not a glimmer is allowed to escape from the windows, and in view of the early rising next morning they are probably quite content to go to bed, as a rule, at an hour when dissipated town-folk are enjoying their late dinner.

The Treatment of Mules.

We always think of mules as obstinate and intractable beasts, and probably most people find them so who do not know how to treat them. But patience and kindness will work wonders with mules, as with other stiff-necked creatures, and one man, at least,—an officer at the front, who has written a delightful letter on the subject to Mr. Cecil Chapman,—has been applying the method with great success. He describes the arrival of fifty mules from America which led his men "a real dance." The animals were all thoroughly upset by their voyage and many handlings, several were quite unaccustomed to harness or to being ridden, and all were in very poor condition. "One man was savaged, and several were kicked on the first day," says the writer, "but I made up my mind to try nothing but kindness in dealing with them. I have never allowed a twitch to be used, or a mule to be hardly treated by beating, nor have I allowed them to be put in stocks when being shod. Kindness has paid in a wonderful way. Our mules let us do what we like with them. . . . . I have always fed them on maize in preference to oats, because it is the food they were brought up upon in Argentina, and I have had no disease of any kind. Indeed, I was congratulated the other day in having the best conditioned mules in the division, not a poor one amongst them, in spite of the hard work which a field company under present conditions finds for them to do."

Mortality at the Zoo.

Prof. H. G. Plimmer, in a recent report presented to the Zoological Society, said that there was a considerable reduction last year in the death-rate at the Zoological Gardens, the numbers being as follows:—mammals, 280; birds, 706; reptiles, 179—representing, respectively, 21 per cent, 27 per cent and 29 per cent of the total there, including new arrivals during the year. If, however, they took only the figures for the occupants of the Gardens since the beginning of the year, which was the best test, the percentages in the three groups were reduced to 18, 15, and 14. Apart from the new arrivals, the cases of infectious disease had been very few, and deaths from tuberculosis had decreased very considerably. One of the only two cases in the reptile house was that of a crocodile, the first recorded of its kind. If they could prevent overcrowding and have proper quarantine he saw no reason why the disease should not be stamped out. There had been two cases of cancer, and, we are sorry to say, many birds had died from overeating.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

DURING the past week the weather in France has unfortunately been as unpleasant for travelling as it has been at home. Notwithstanding the difficulties and exposure Mrs. Allen and Mr. Kelland have been able to carry out most of their plans, and they will return next week, not only with a large fund of first-hand information about the Belgian hospitals which we are helping, but also with renewed confidence in the goodwill of those in authority gained in many personal interviews. Full official sanction has been given to our scheme for erecting a Hut for the use of the Belgian Army. The hospital for refugee children, for which we appealed last week, will be equipped as quickly as possible. Our readers will hear with cordial pleasure and approval that our Belgian friends on the spot insist upon calling it "The Rose Allen Hospital." Nothing could be more fitting. It will add to the pleasure and pride with which they respond to any appeal on behalf of its needs, which we shall have to make from time to time.

IT would be most unfitting that we should pass on to our usual review of topics and events without first of all paying our tribute of admiration and gratitude to the people of France. For the past fortnight they have sustained the full force of one of the most terrific battles of the war. The army has fought with magnificent courage, and the civilian population has stood behind, firm and resolute, without a word of panic or selfish fear or useless criticism. These are the conditions of victory. Even more than military equipment it is the moral factor which has made it an unequal conflict. The French have the advantage of fighting on their own soil, and no doubt about the rightness of their cause can impair their strength. They are upheld by their ideals. The Germans are the aggressors. They can appeal to no high standard of right. Their love for the Fatherland has in it no saving reverence for justice. They know in their hearts that they have no business to be where they are.

WE congratulate our friends in America most heartily upon the signal victory of President Wilson, both in the Senate and in Congress. We hope that they will believe us when we say that we do so chiefly, not on account of any advantage which may possibly accrue to ourselves, but because it is a victory for clean politics. Even more important than the question of international law about the right of merchantmen to arm themselves for self-defence is the need of clear and decisive action against base intrigue. Had the vote in Congress gone the other way it would have been a triumph, not for independent thinking, but for German plotters who desire to control the political life of a free people for their own ends. The effect which it will have upon the internal situation is not our affair, and we have no wish even to speculate upon it. As a blow struck for political morality it is the affair of the world. The instructions issued to our own merchant vessels which are allowed to carry guns, make it quite clear that all that is permitted is the right to defend themselves against murderous attack. This right is a common possession. It is as vital for America, and perhaps in the long run for Germany, as it is for ourselves.

WHEN Mr. Winston Churchill retired from the Admiralty nothing was lacking in personal dignity and reticence. His demeanour called forth general admiration. We ourselves praised it highly at the time. It is a pity that he has once again been mastered by his instinct for political sensationalism. Whether his speech on Tuesday had in it a large element of offended vanity or was prompted by the genuine anxiety of a man for a department which he no longer controls, we do not pretend to judge. In any case Mr. Balfour's condemnation of it as "very unfortunate both in substance and in form," could hardly be improved. When the speech is analysed it will be seen that it was a clever attempt to sow suspicion without any attempt to grapple with facts. It simply played into the hands of small groups of malcontents in Parliament and the Press, who are vocal quite out of proportion to their importance. The desire for our fleet to come out and make a splash, or that we should have a battle of Verdun every month in order to cheer our drooping spirits is natural to many people. Monotony and slow progress provide plenty of food for the grumbler. But let us remember that demands of this kind are usually the sign of petulant weakness, not of calm and conquering strength.

THE party of distinguished Russian journalists has returned to London after what may be described as an extended military and naval tour. The members were entertained on Monday by the Institute of Journalists. In proposing the health of the guests the President, Mr. A. G. Gardiner, spoke of the need of unity—loyal, absolute, and unquestioning—and of the way in which this unity was reflected in their Russian visitors, who, though they represented many sharp divisions of opinion in regard to internal affairs, had at the present time one common purpose.

> Their visitors [he said] came not merely as journalists, but as unofficial ambassadors of a people with whom we were sharing in a common tribulation and a common glory. We had been separated from that people in the past by many things—by the hard, solid facts of geography, by the difficulties of an extremely obstinate language, by distrust, and, to some extent, by our own insular habit of thought. Those things were reinforced by the fact that we had in the past not been very adventurous in our friendships, and had not exercised very much wisdom in extending them. That had applied peculiarly, perhaps, to the case of Russia, which had come to a great maturity of thought and originality. He doubted whether there was any people with whom we had a larger potentiality of sympathy, of affinity, and of contact than the Russian people. There was in the Russian people a large humanity, a spaciousness of vision and atmosphere, and, above all, a spirituality of outlook which was one of the greatest assurances for the future of the world.

In the course of his reply M. Vladimir Nabokov spoke very hopefully of the political outlook in Russia. He acknowledged the difficulty of cordial relations existing between two countries, if one were governed by law and the other by despotism, and the fundamental elements of liberty and equity were accepted by one and rejected by the other. But he regarded the reassembling of the Duma as a most significant event. It meant the end of control by a section of the aristocracy with its devotion to Prussian methods of government, Prussian methods of dealing with minorities, Prussian contempt for higher ideals, Prussian admiration for the mailed fist as a supreme argument, Prussian confidence that right had to yield to might.

> It was [he said] one of the immediate consequences of this war that the Duma's existence had been strengthened and its absolute necessity for the welfare of the Russian people revealed to the dullest mind. "Made in Germany" theories of Absolutism had to disappear. The visit of the Tsar to the Duma, and the words which he was pleased to speak, had confirmed unwritten but morally binding guarantees. The people of Russia undoubtedly had before them a period of reconstruction and of reform. But that period would no more be troubled by the mischief-makers belonging to another and a darker age.

The National Council of Evangelical Free Churches has been in session at Bradford this week. The new President, the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, who succeeds Sir J. Compton-Rickett, delivered an address on the dangers of Nonconformist disunion and launched a proposal for a vast scheme of federation. He has, in our opinion, chosen a most unfortunate moment for inaugurating his campaign. No doubt he is in close touch with the facts when he deplores the alienation of many of the best elements in our national life from the churches and the immense waste of spiritual energy in competitive efforts. But is the magic word federation going to accomplish what he desires without a much more thorough handling of the problem of religion as a whole? Will the men and women who are not attracted now feel any greater charm in a United Free Church, with the same theology and the familiar ritual? In any case a scheme of this kind will require the full energy of brain and heart on the part of the ablest men if it is not to peter out in futile discussion. Is it seriously contended that this is their proper business at the present moment, when we ought as far as possible to forget our divisions and to avoid every kind of sectional activity which will make us less sensitive to the teaching of experience and less capable of co-operation with men who, in old and narrower days, lived and thought in a different fashion from ourselves?

If a scheme of this kind is persisted in it will necessarily fail to enlist the interest of the best men, and that for several reasons. They are busy with more urgent tasks. They are away at the front, fighting their country's battles. They are deeply conscious that the whole world is in process of transformation, and they feel that we may be on the eve of far-reaching changes in religion. Every instinct of reverence forbids them to dogmatise about the new experience which is still being revealed to them in the unselfish devotion, the death and triumph of their fellow-men. It may be that many of the old forms, so precious to themselves, will not fit it at all, and will pass away because they have outlived their usefulness. They cannot tell. This is not scepticism or indifference. It springs from a more sublime faith in God than is possible to most of us in ordinary days.

It is for this reason that schemes and movements of the familiar pattern, organised by the ecclesiastical mind behind the ramparts of battle leave us cold. We find ourselves more in agreement with the position of Artifex, who wrote as follows in Thursday's Manchester Guardian:—

> I do not attack the Church. I write as one who loves the Church. But I do certainly think that the war has revealed, as nothing has ever done before, the weakness of the Church and the failure of organised religion as expressed in all the denominations to guide and inspire the nation. And the secret of that failure appears to me to be too deep-seated to be met by any ordinary means. National missions and similar special efforts may help the few that are within, and may draw in an individual here and there from without, but will, I am sure, leave the mass of the nation unaffected. The cure must be as searching, as far-reaching, and must go as deep as the mischief. That is why I desire some action on the part of the Church which would compel the most thoughtless to recognise her as the guardian of the spiritual life of the nation, and as existing not for herself and her own ends, but simply and solely for the service of God and mankind.

The fact that we wrote rather critically last week about Henry James and his books only increases the pleasure with which we quote the following tribute by Mr. Gosse to his greatness as a man. It appeared in a letter to The Times last Saturday. It describes the transfiguration which has come to thousands of men and women in these days, but evidently came to him in an unequalled degree:—

> No man has awakened greater loyalty or penetrated so many shy spirits with affection. But we want to proclaim to the sensual world that when the war with Germany broke out, he ceased to be merely the idol of an esoteric group He became a soldier; he belonged to England No one has suffered more in spirit no one was more tensely agitated by the war, than Henry James. Not that he doubted of our victory, which was to be his victory. In the deadliest trances of the night he never questioned the end. But his nature was like a violin string, and it was strained until it snapped. He was a supreme artist; but what we must remember and repeat is that he was a hero. He belonged to a neutral nation that he was attached to by a thousand ties. Yet he broke them all to devote himself, heart and brain and vibrating nerves, entirely to his passionate love of England. He was a volunteer in our great cause. Quite in the beginning of August, 1914, he said to two English friends, "However British you may be, I am more British still." He has died before we celebrate the catastrophe of wickedness, and perhaps it is as well, for his great heart might have broken with joy in the midst of the huzzas.

RUSSIAN POLAND.

It is one of the bitterest things in the present tragedy that it is often impossible to give our help where it is most needed. We ourselves are warm and well-fed, while thousands are perishing of cold and hunger, and there is no way in which we can send them even the barest necessaries of life without prolonging the war and thereby adding to the sum of human misery. A short time ago our Government had to send a dignified refusal to the impassioned appeal of the Poles in America that we would so far release our commercial blockade of Germany as to allow food to go through to their starving compatriots. To some people it seemed a terribly stern thing to do. With aching hearts they asked whether this was not one of the cases where the claims of humanity ought to override the stern laws of war. But a moment's calm reflection revealed the probability that any attempt to relieve the Russian Poles might only prolong their agony, because the food intended for them would go to supply the needs of the German army and civilian population. Without adequate guarantees, which have not been forthcoming, it was impossible for our Government to do anything.

We understand that sinister use is being made of this refusal by German agents in neutral countries. It is not the first time that Germany, with supreme cynicism, has attempted to exploit the feeling of outraged humanity for her own advantage; but our contempt for such tactics must not lead us to underestimate their influence. It was clear that Mr. Asquith's official reply was based on something more solid than suspicion. A plain statement of the facts which has just been issued by Mr. Arnold J. Toynbee is a complete vindication of his attitude. But it is something more, it is one of the most scathing exposures of the logic of brutality, which even this ruthless war has provided.

We must state the case in a few words, leaving our readers to consult Mr. Toynbee's pages for themselves. Germany has determined either to bend the Russian Poles to her will or to exterminate them. She began by commandeering the harvest for her own use, and cutting off all supplies of food except the small amount which was allowed to be sold at exorbitant profits by a German company. It cannot be pleaded that this was one of the harsh necessities of war, for she followed up this first step by strangling the whole industrial life of the country. The machinery of the mines was wrecked and the factories have been closed. Commercial jealousy of a thriving community has apparently led the German bureaucracy to aim at the permanent extirpation of Polish industry. All attempts to meet this appalling situation by the philanthropy of the wealthier citizens have been stopped and their committees have been disbanded, for the object is to drive the artisans to flee from starvation by the bribe of work and wages in Germany.

> The Germans [Mr. Toynbee writes] hoped high things from their "organisation" of Poland. They hoped to organise Polish food into German warehouses, and to organise Polish industry out of existence, and that much they have achieved. But their greatest dream was this exploitation of Polish man-power, this drafting of skilled and docile helots into German workshops and mines, so that every able-bodied German might be free to take his rifle and enter the fighting ranks, with a vast impetus to German military power. It was an audacious conception, but it has failed—failed, as so often happens with German schemes, through a radical mistake in psychology.... The spirit of the Polish people has not been broken, and Germany has been foiled of her expectation. But Poland is still in her power, and there is nothing to restrain Germany from her revenge. The suffering of Poland grows more terrible month by month.

It is a terrible alternative to accept starvation rather than yield to the lash of the taskmaster; but that is what the great industrial population of Warsaw and Lodz is doing. Here and there a corner of the veil has been lifted, but the full tale of their misery can only be told when the yoke of the oppressor is broken Here is one picture which must stand for many others, taken from the narrative of a visitor to Lodz quoted by Mr. Toynbee:—

> Wishing to acquaint myself with the misery in the factory towns, and to consider means of relief, I went to Lodz. What I found surpassed my most awful fears. The population is slowly dying, after exhausting its forces in a hopeless struggle. I went under the guidance of the relief caretaker of the district, and I visited only one street, Ciemna, in the suburb of Bluty. We went to the house of a boy, who is now in our Home for Children at Kutno. We were to take his love to his parents. "Our parents are gone," answered his eldest sister of about 15. "Father died a week ago of exhaustion, and the day after father's funeral mother died of typhus. It is the same next door. Both the father and the mother have died during the war, leaving four small children in the care of a brother of 18." When we entered this other tenement we found the youngest child of two dead, and the girl of 4 dying. There were others who had no strength left to fetch wood from the forests round the town, and were burning everything they had—tables, beds, and even picture-frames. In one of these tenements we found only a group of crying children. The mother had died and the father had gone out into the country to beg for potatoes. They had sold everything, even the bedding, the most precious possession of the poor.

In face of all this misery we are, for the moment, helpless. Why then should we torture our hearts with a recital of these things? For two reasons. First, because we ought to live day by day in conscious fellowship with it. It is part of the price which Europe is paying for her freedom. Our sufferings are insignificant compared with those of these martyrs for the common cause, ours as well as theirs; but we can at least avoid the guilt of the indifference which flings them a momentary tribute of pity, and then turns with relief to the pleasant scenes of our ordinary life. And let us remember, in the second place, that there is neither manliness nor safety in forgetfulness. We must conquer this evil spirit or it will strangle every good and holy thing in life. If the moment has not come when we can deal out bread to the hungry, we can dedicate all our strength to the holy tasks of deliverance, to loose the bonds of wickedness, to undo the heavy burden, and to let the oppressed go free.

The Destruction of Poland: a Study in German Efficiency. By Arnold J. Toynbee. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 2*d*.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Whoso in noble spirit doeth favours
Sweetens them in the doing: they who do them
Grudging and late, theirs is the spirit of churls.
Lo, I will yield mine own child up to die!
Many thoughts prompt me: first, this land of ours—
None other better home might man inherit.
Again, for this cause children have we borne,
To fence the fanes of God and fatherland.
One name the whole state hath, but many dwell
Therein: how dare I yield to ruin these,
I, who for all can yield my one to death?
If aught I can compute—compare small things
With great—the fall of one house meriteth
Not more regard, nay less, than a whole state.
If flame of war enwrapped this very town,
Should I for dread of death not send my sons
Forth to the strife of swords? Nay, be my sons
Such as shall fight and win renown with men,
Not be vain outward shows our streets within!
Out upon women who, in honour's stead,
Choose for their sons life, counsel craven fear!
My child—mine only according to the flesh—
I give for the land's ransom! If this land
Fall, of my children then what profit have I?
Shall I not do my part then to save all?
Let others rule her, I will save my Country!
Countrymen, use ye this fruit of my womb;
Be saved, be victors! At one dear life's cost
This dear land to her children will I save!
My country, O that all who people thee
May love thee even as I!—then shall we dwell
At ease in thee, thou never suffer harm.

Euripides.

(From Dr. Way's translation of the 'Erechtheus.')

Suffer me not, O Lord, suffer me not to forget how at the very moment when, it may be, I am thus playing with a fantastic grief, it is actually faring with multitudes of my fellows, many times better and truer and holier than myself. Think, O my soul, of all those—the mourners who have survived everything, even hope itself, the incurables who pace the long halls of pain in the vast hospital of this world; its deposed, discrowned, and disinherited, for whom all the ornament of life has for ever departed, perhaps by their own fault, perhaps by that of others, but in either case gone, and so gone that it never can come back again; long pain the road by which, and death the goal to which, they must travel.

R. C. Trench.

Grant unto us, Almighty God, the peace of God that passeth understanding, that we, amid the storms and troubles of this our life, may rest in Thee, knowing that all things are in Thee; not beneath Thine eye only, but under Thy care, governed by Thy will, guarded by Thy love, so that with a quiet heart we may see the storms of life, the cloud and the thick darkness, ever rejoicing to know that the darkness and the light are both alike to Thee. Guide, guard, and govern us even to the end, that none of us may fail to lay hold upon immortal life. Amen.

DR. DANIEL WILLIAMS AND HIS TRUST.

IV.

THE LIBRARY (2).

With its removal from Cripplegate to Bloomsbury the Library leapt suddenly from the eighteenth—one may almost say from the seventeenth—century to the nineteenth. Contemporaneously with the opening of the new building in Grafton Street in 1873 came the drawing up of the list of names, lay and clerical, drawn from all denominations, "authorized by the Trustees to introduce persons to the use of the Library." The introduction of this new and wide scheme of guarantee transformed the Library from a proprietary to a public institution in practice, as well as in principle, and made possible the realisation of the pious hopes of earlier years. The number of borrowers rose in the next twelve years from about 100 to over 4,000 per annum.

And yet here, as in the other activities of the Trust, there has been no real break. The development of the last forty years is the result, not of any deliberate or drastic change of policy, but of the natural reaction of circumstances upon the old policy.

Mr. Yates's reproach that the contents of the Library are "of a most indefinite and miscellaneous character" is now its proud boast. The Library is in no sense a specialist's library. There is no department, not even excepting that of theology, in which the advanced research student will not find himself pulled up fairly early. On the other hand, the general reader, of a serious turn of mind, in theology, philosophy, history, sociology, literature, every subject almost except pure science, will find ample material to supply his wants.

The special collections which attracted students of Nonconformity in the first half of last century, have slipped back into a position of secondary importance, but it is proper to remember that by so doing they allow the present general library of modern literature to link itself up by a direct line of descent, to the original library left by the Founder.

The original collection, as shown in the pages of the catalogue of 1727, consists of the combined libraries of Dr. Williams himself and of Dr. Bates, whose library was purchased entire by the former, on Dr. Bates's death in 1699. Comparatively few of the books have a name in them, and it is dangerous to jump to conclusions from a few isolated instances; but judging from the autographs which have come to the present writer's notice, and from what we know of the two doctors, we may take it that, generally speaking, the choice editions of the classics and other books which appeal to the bibliophile are from the library of Dr. Bates, the solid theology from that of Dr. Williams himself.

But there is also a very large proportion of French, Italian, and even Spanish literature, and a much larger amount of secular English Literature, plays, and the like, than one would naturally expect. It has never, so far as I am aware, been suggested that we may owe the bulk of these, as well as the general endowment of the Trust, to the doctor's two wives. The second Mrs. Williams, Mistress Barkstead, came of a good Huguenot stock, and one has only to look at the portraits of herself and her first husband to see that she was a person, not only of substance, but of quality. Either of them may have brought from their first husbands a good gentleman's library, as well as a fortune.

If this be indeed the case, it makes it all the more satisfactory to be able to record that women were admitted to the use of the library at least as early as 1794, when Miss Sarah Thompson, by order of Dr. Towers, borrowed Dr. Robertson's 'History of Charles V,' and Dr. Blair's 'Lectures on Rhetoric'; and that when, in 1886, it became necessary for the first time to provide the Librarian with regular help, a woman was appointed as the first Assistant Librarian, a post which she still holds, proud of her thirty years' record, proud also of the fact that she was one of the first lady librarians in the country.

Side by side with the general library there has grown up, again more by chance than by design, a small but extremely valuable specialists' library. During the whole of the eighteenth century the Library was the natural depository for printed books, manuscripts, and portraits relating to Nonconformity. This special department cannot fairly be traced either to Dr. Williams or Dr. Bates.

Its nucleus is formed by the rare collection of Tudor and Stuart pamphlets relating to the early struggles of the Puritans acquired by the Library on the death of Dr. John Evans in 1730. These include several Marprelate tracts, a few tracts by Penry, and a very scarce tract by Robert Browne, the father of Congregationalism. From the library of Dr. Evans came also what is known as the "Evans Manuscript," a statistical survey of the state of the Dissenting churches throughout England and Wales in 1715 and following years, and probably, though not certainly, the famous "Morrice Manuscripts," relating to the early history of Puritanism, an excellent calendar of the most important of which, the so-called 'Seconde parte of a register,' has just been published by Dr. Albert Peel.

About the same time Matthew Sylvester presented "Several manuscripts of Mr Baxter," including his correspondence and a number of holographs of published and unpublished treatises by him, also the original manuscript of his autobiography, the famous 'Reliquiæ,' which is mentioned in the old catalogue of manuscripts, but has, alas, long disappeared.

Mention must also be made of the original minutes of the Assembly of Divines, which sat at Westminster during the eventful years 1643 to 1649, and drew up not only the now forgotten 'Directory for Public Worship,' which, for a few brief years took the place of the Book of Common Prayer, but also the Confession of Faith and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms which are still in use in the Church of Scotland. A priceless little volume containing a number of pamphlets, all excessively rare, if not actually unique, by members of the Pilgrim Fathers' Church in Holland in the early seventeenth century, came to the Library in a large and very miscellaneous bequest from the Rev. John Archer of Hackney, who died in 1733.

Of the benefactions of Mr. Thomas Hollis, mention was made in the previous article: to his heir, Mr. Thomas Brand Hollis, the Library owes its fine collection of first editions of Milton's prose works; Dr. Disney, to whom the Hollis fortune and estates next passed, enriched the Library with a fine collection of early Nonconformist liturgies, of pamphlet literature arising out of the publication of Archdeacon Blackburn's Confessional, and of the subsequent controversy on the question of clerical subscription, not to mention many other works of a more miscellaneous character, all bearing the donor's neat monogram.

The section of original sources for the early history of Nonconformity may be said to close with the extensive manuscript collections bequeathed to the Library by the late Walter Wilson, author of 'The History and Antiquities of Dissenting Meeting Houses in London, Westminster, and Southwark,' together with his own interleaved and annotated copy of the work, and a superb copy, with pages inlaid and bound in eight enormous folio volumes, extra-illustrated with innumerable rare and valuable prints. If we add to the books and manuscripts already mentioned the fine series of portraits of Nonconformist divines, including Baxter, Isaac Watts, and Priestley, it will be easy to understand how the Library acquired in the course of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries an unique reputation among students of Nonconformity.

But, quite apart from these Nonconformist treasures, an institution with a past of two hundred years can hardly fail to have acquired many objects of more general antiquarian interest. The mummy, mentioned by Mr. Herford, now shares a position of well-deserved obscurity in the cellars with a stuffed monkey. These departments have been taken over by the British Museum, which, it must be remembered, was not founded till four and twenty years after the Library was opened. The cast of Cartouche, the great Parisian robber, which figures in old guide-books and histories of London as one of the objects of interest to be seen at the Library, has long since disappeared. But we still treasure the christening-bowl, also a death-mask of Oliver Cromwell, doubtless an heirloom in the Barkstead family, Col. John Barkstead, the father of the second Mrs. Williams's first husband, having been steward of Cromwell's household.

The Library also contains a fine copy of the First Folio Shakespeare, perfect except for Ben Jonson's verses (one cannot help wondering whether these were removed by "Two gentlemen to examine Shakespeare Folio," entered in the Visitors' Book on February 27, 1864); there are at least two books containing Ben Jonson's autograph; all these three are from the original library bequeathed by Dr. Williams.

Other treasures are a contemporary transcript of George Herbert's 'Temple,' with alterations in his own hand, and Isaac Watts's pocket Greek Testament, in its original velvet case, with the owner's autograph on the fly-leaf.

Latest in date, but among the most important in both bulk and interest, comes the whole of Crabb Robinson's diaries, reminiscences, and correspondence. Henry Crabb Robinson was not himself a great man, but during the first half of the nineteenth century he knew every one worth knowing: Wordsworth, Lamb, Coleridge, Carlyle in England, Goethe, Wieland, Madame de Stäel on the Continent, are but a few of the names that could be mentioned as friends and correspondents. It has been estimated that his diaries, if printed in extenso, would fill about forty volumes of the length of one of Mrs. Humphry Ward's novels, and the diaries are supplemented by the reminiscences written in after years, and often by transcripts or returned originals of letters written at the time. Crabb Robinson was much interested in the foundation of University Hall, and left money to be spent on beautifying it. The chairs in the lecture hall bear his monogram, and the famous frescoes on its walls represent him surrounded by his friends. It is peculiarly appropriate that the diaries and correspondence should find their final resting place under the same roof.

In pure theology, curiously enough, the Library has few treasures. In this department its strength has always lain, quite properly, in the present rather than the past. We have no copy of the Complutensian Polyglot Bible of 1514, containing the first printed Greek Testament; we have no early edition of the Vulgate, no copy of the Authorised Version of 1611. In the manuscript department we possess an exceptionally small and beautiful Vulgate of the late thirteenth century, and of the late seventeenth century two curiosities, a very small complete Bible written in shorthand, and a very large New Testament in fifteen huge volumes, painted in white letters on a black ground. But of these the interest is antiquarian rather than theological.

Overshadowed by the British Museum, and the great libraries of Oxford and Cambridge, surrounded by rate-supported and subscription libraries, enough has been said to show that our own library still has a special place to fill, a past worth preserving, a present worth pursuing. What its future lines of development will be it is hard to say. One can scarcely predict for the coming years anything like the dramatic expansion of the past half century. But it must be remembered that there is a life of manhood which does not express itself in cubits. If the Library has passed through childhood's period of visible growth, and is settling down to the steady work of middle age, she need have no occasion to feel ashamed of her 22,000 issues per annum, or to doubt of her continued usefulness.

DATES OF FOUNDATION OF CONGREGATIONS.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, desiring to make the list of dates of foundation of the Congregations included in the Essex Hall Year Book as accurate as possible, has requested the Unitarian Historical Society to verify and revise it. In response to a circular issued last Christmas to the Congregations on the roll asking for information, no less than 158 replies have already come to hand evidencing a lively interest in the history of the several churches. May I ask those who have not yet replied if they would kindly send in the forms as and when completed? In some cases further research is, I hear, being made among the early papers and deeds for facts and figures bearing on the matter. I take this opportunity of thanking all those who have given assistance in this inquiry by filling up the forms, and, in some cases, forwarding the History of the Chapel or Meeting-House to which they are attached. Papers accompanied with a request for return will be sent back in due course when the information is filed.—Yours, &c. Walter H. Burgess, Hon. Sec.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. E. F. COOPER.

We deeply regret to record the death of Mr. E. Franklin Cooper, which took place at Anstey Grange, near Leicester, on Friday, February 25. He was born in Leicester in 1833, and was educated privately. After a short period in business with his father, he entered Paget's Bank in 1854. In 1895, when the Bank was purchased by Lloyd's Banking Co., he was appointed to the responsible position of manager, and eventually retired in 1901. He was widely known and respected in business and financial circles in Leicester; but his interests were by no means confined to his official duties. He served for many years on the Museum and Art Gallery Committee, and also filled the offices of Vice-President of the Leicester Literary and Philosophical Society, and Treasurer of the Leicester Town Charities. His scientific attainments received recognition in the Fellowship of the Linnæan Society. But it is at the Great Meeting, with which he and his family have been so long and so intimately connected, that his loss will be most deeply felt. During the years of his active life he was not only a regular attendant at the services, he was also prominent as a wise leader and friend in all the activities of the congregation. Many ministers all over the country look back with gratitude to the bright and simple hospitality which they enjoyed in his home.

Mr. Cooper married in 1863 a daughter of Mr. H. D. Thew, of Liverpool. It will be remembered that one of his sons, Capt. Arthur Cooper, was killed in action in the early part of the war. Two others are in business in Leicester, and the Rev. Gordon Cooper is the minister of the Mansford Street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green. The following tribute to his memory appeared in The Leicester Daily Post:—

"Mr. E. Franklin Cooper, whose death we regretfully record to-day, was one of the rapidly narrowing circle of men who played an important part in the building-up of modern commercial Leicester. The responsible position which he held in Messrs. Paget's (now Lloyd's) Bank, brought him into intimate relations with its chief business men, and his unfailing courtesy and shrewd judgment won for him the respect and regard of a wide circle of friends. Spared to reach a ripe old age, he was a fount of information on the development of Leicester, the town, and its industries, and he was a link between the old and the new banking systems. Modern requirements, with trade ramifications to the uttermost parts of the globe, call for great joint stock institutions, with branches in all the great towns; but the old system of private banks was also suited to its age, and materially contributed to the building-up of the vast industrial system of to-day."

The funeral took place on Tuesday, February 29. A Memorial Service was conducted in the Great Meeting, Leicester, by the Revs. E. I. Fripp and H. Gow. There was a numerous congregation of relatives, friends, and the general public. The Rev. H. Gow, in the course of a brief address, said that reverently and lovingly they remembered the friend for whom God's swift and sudden call had come. They would pray God that their joy and their gratitude might be worthy of what he was, and all that he did through long years of happy, earnest, faithful work and love—that their joy and their gratitude might be deeper than their sorrow at his loss. They prayed that they might feel that death was swallowed up in victory. They would make that Memorial Service a service of thanksgiving for God's great gift of a brave, pure, true, and faithful life. He was so human, so kind, so gentle and loving until the end. Many grateful memories of him were in all their hearts that day. There were few men more widely known and more respected in that city. For many years he was one of the most familiar figures in their midst. They remembered the hospitality of his home, and with what genial, ever-ready welcome he received his friends. They remembered him as a trusted adviser, as a man of high standard of honour and of scrupulous integrity. There was a certain deep modesty and reticence in him which made him shrink too much from public office and from public speech. Those who knew him best realised what wide and deep knowledge he possessed. He had studied nature with a most loving care, and he was distinguished in some departments of antiquarian history. But they remembered much more than this, they remembered how good and loyal and affectionate a friend he was, how he loved life, how interested he was in little things, what confidence he inspired, how free he was from claims of self, how much happiness he felt and gave. They remembered his devotion to truth and duty, and a certain peaceful beauty and childlike joyousness of spirit which were behind all his work. He could never have said, in the best years of his life, though he had known much sorrow, in the sad words of Augustine, "Alas, my childhood is dead, and I am alive." He had known great sorrow, and they knew how deeply he felt recently the loss of a beloved son. He suffered that beautiful and noble sorrow without complaint and without fear. It gave him a new dignity which made them love him more. It did not break his spirit, though it nearly broke his heart. Pride in his son, and willingness to give him for his country, was deeper than his sorrow. He knew that the greatest thing in life and death was love. Might his memory help them to be strong and confident, and to look forward with deeper trust and hope to that life beyond the grave, when all tears should be wiped away, and where they would meet again those loved ones who had gone before.

A Memorial Service was held in the Great Meeting last Sunday morning. In the course of his sermon the Rev. E. I. Fripp paid an affectionate tribute to Mr. Cooper's memory, and closed with the following words:—"No one, I think, could love his home more than he did, and next to his home and his children he loved his chapel. It was almost a part of his household. Its simple faith, in which he had been brought up, the faith of his childhood and his old age, comforted him in his bereavements as it brightened all his happiness. He had learned to say, in sunshine and in storm, 'Our Father, who art in Heaven.'"

NEW Y.M.C.A. HUT AT THETFORD.

OPENING CEREMONY.

The largest Y.M.C.A. Hut in East Anglia was opened at Thetford Camp on Thursday, Feb. 24, by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, whose generosity provided the funds for its erection. The hut is 150 ft. long, and 65 ft. at its widest part. The main portion is set apart for recreation, and is fitted up with two full-sized billiard tables, and smaller tables for reading and writing. In addition there will also be a lending library, for which 600 volumes have been secured. Each end of the building is constructed in the form of a T. One of these sections is intended for a lecture room, measuring 60 ft. by 40 ft., and may be closed off from the main building by sliding doors. At the opposite end are all the accessories for catering : behind a 40 ft. serving counter are kitchen, scullery, larder, bathroom, manager's office, and staff dining and bedrooms ; the building is lighted by electricity.

Mr. H. Lee Warner of Swaffam, presided at the opening, supported on the platform by Major-General Kelly, C.B., Mr. Ronald P. Jones, Col. W. W. Whistler (Senior Chaplain to the Division), and other Anglican and Nonconformist chaplains, Mr. C. W. Fison, Chairman of the Thetford Y.M.C.A., and others.

The proceedings opened with a hymn, 'Fight the Good Fight,' and dedicatory prayers offered by the Rev. W. W. Whistler.

The Chairman spoke of the great work which was being done by the Y.M.C.A. among the troops. It stood for making a clean life, healthy friendships, and increased manliness ; it gave the men an opportunity of keeping in touch with their homes by providing facilities for letter writing. He reminded the men of the name of the Association to which they owed so much, and pointed out that it showed that the Y.M.C.A. appealed to men of all denominations. Both from a Christian and from a national point of view the Association brought men of different thoughts closer together.

Mr. Jones, in declaring the building open, said that though he was not qualified to speak for the Y.M.C.A. as a member, he was glad to unite with them in their work, just as they threw open these huts to all comers without restrictions. He asked those who were going to use the hut to remember that, although such huts and tents were found in almost every place where troops were stationed, they were not provided as a matter of course by the War Office, but were the result of a great voluntary effort, and that much trouble was taken to make them pleasant and comfortable and to provide recreation of all kinds. When they came into the hut they were practically the guests of the Y.M.C.A., and he hoped that they would treat the building and the officials with consideration, and observe such rules as it was desirable to draw up. He had much pleasure in opening the hut, and offering it for the use of the Division.

Major-General Kelly, in proposing a vote of thanks on behalf of the British Army in general, and the Thetford troops in particular, to Mr. Jones for his munificence, expressed on behalf of the soldiers present their very great appreciation of the work done by the Y.M.C.A., which, he believed, was the first Society in the field at the outbreak of the war. Since then they had done increasing work in huts and tents wherever the British soldier was located, some of the huts being quite close to the firing line.

Mr. Fison seconded the proposal, and, after acknowledging their indebtedness to Mr. Jones, said that the sum of £273 had been collected from over one hundred donors in Thetford towards the cost of equipping and furnishing the interior of the hut, and they hoped as time went on that this amount would be increased.

The proposition was carried with acclamation, and at the call of General Kelly, three hearty cheers were given for Mr. Jones, who briefly responded.

BELFAST DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Belfast Domestic Mission was held in the Central Hall last Monday evening. The proceedings began with tea served in the Library under the supervision of Mrs. Harold Thomas. At 8 o'clock Dr. John Campbell took the chair, there being a representative attendance of subscribers and supporters of the Mission. After Scripture readings and prayer the Committee's Report was read by Miss Charlotte Bruce, who also presented that of the Mothers' Meeting. Mr. John Mackenzie submitted the Treasurer's statement of accounts, showing a satisfactory balance to the credit of the Mission ; while Mr. Hugh Erskine spoke of the work of the Provident Fund, and, while testifying to its increased operations, appealed for still wider support. The Missionary (the Rev. Fred. Woolley) then submitted a very interesting and comprehensive review of the year's work, making plain most satisfactory progress in every department of the Mission's many-sided activities. The Chairman formally moved the adoption of the reports and balance sheet, and called upon the Rev. W. H. Drummond, who had on the previous day preached the annual sermons of the Mission at the First Church in the morning and All Souls' Church in the evening. In seconding the adoption of the resolution Mr. Drummond expressed appreciation of the work to which all the reports bore testimony, emphasising that work as a convincing justification of the faith in the future possibilities of the Mission manifested some years ago when the Mission's affairs were far less flourishing. Nothing could be more apparent in the present day than the need of such a mission as a centre of moral and spiritual influence. While the work of the Provident Fund was most useful and necessary, and while he claimed that still more might be done in that direction to encourage habits of thrift, he considered that the collectors accomplished even more, viz., the establishing of friendly relations with the depositors, which told for incalculable good in the moral uplifting of their lives. Undoubtedly, the present war would be responsible for the rise of new temptations, against which the best safeguard would be the stronger and more religious characters nourished by the personal contact and care which a Domestic Mission existed to promote. He, therefore, rejoiced in the good accomplished, and wished for the Mission and its workers another year of increasing success and usefulness. A resolution expressing appreciation of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Woolley was moved in appropriate terms by the Rev. G. L. Phelps. The seconder was Ald. Wm. Tougher, J.P., who testified to the excellent impression made upon himself by what he had seen of Mr. and Mrs. Woolley's work. The Rev. M. Watkins reminded his hearers of the claims upon their gratitude of the voluntary workers of the Mission, mentioning particularly the readiness with which Dr. Malcolm Brice Smyth had placed his medical skill at the service of the needy. Mr. Eustace Gordon seconded the resolution. The Rev. J. A. Kelly proposed the election of the Management Committee and the Ladies' Committee. Mr. W. H. McFadden seconded the resolution, and this, like the preceding resolution, was carried heartily and unanimously. Mr. C. J. McKisack expressed the thanks of the meeting to Dr. John Campbell for presiding, and the Rev. H. J. Rossington seconded, and also included in the vote of thanks Mrs. Harold Thomas, for taking charge of the tea. The pronouncing of the Benediction brought a very successful meeting to a conclusion.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

A Meeting of the Board of Managers was held at Essex Hall, London, on Wednesday, 1st inst., the Rev. Dr. Carpenter presiding. The Annual Report and accounts were adopted and ordered to be printed and circulated as usual. The result of the greatly improved advantages now made possible through the adoption of a new set of insurance tables, and the raising of the maximum contribution towards premiums of beneficiaries through the legacy from Mr. Philip Holt, was seen in the large increase of applications. Nine were granted for ordinary pension and life insurance, thirteen for the new Children's Education Endowment, and also six for special cases of insurance. The annual call upon the Fund was consequently increased by over £200. A resolution of regret and sympathy at the death of Mr. John Lawson, a former member of the Board, was adopted. The Annual Report showed that the number of beneficiaries at the end of 1915 was 120, of whom 112 were insured under the regular tables, 10 being already in receipt of their pension, and 1 having qualified for it. Four of these beneficiaries were also being helped for further insurance. Outside the regular tables 6 ministers were being assisted towards special insurance, and 2 aged ministers were in receipt of a small annuity. The Board continues to pay its proportion of premium to any minister who has undertaken war service. The Insurance Society generously decided to make no further charge for war risk upon policies effected before the war broke out. Death and other changes has reduced the subscription list from its proper level of £300 to £262, and appeal is made to those who are interested in this good work to rally to the support of the Fund, the claims upon which are always becoming greater.

On Friday, March 17, at 6.30 o'clock, Mr. Edward Clodd is to deliver the Seventh Conway Memorial Lecture at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, his subject being 'Gibbon and Christianity.' Sir Sydney Olivier will preside, and admission will be free except to a few reserved seats.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—A meeting in aid of the Belgian Hospital Fund was held in Rosemary Hall (All Souls' Church) on Friday evening, March 3. The chair was taken by the Rev. D. Purves, D.D., of Elmwood Presbyterian Church, and a special address on the work of the Fund was given by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. At the close Dr. Robert Campbell moved a vote of thanks, which was supported by the Revs. H. J. Rossington and E. S. Pickering. A collection was taken on behalf of the Fund, and the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by Mr. J. F. Mulligan and seconded by the Rev. G. L. Phelps.

Bournemouth.—A special musical service was held in the Unitarian Church, West Hill Road, last Sunday evening, the music, in addition to hymns, including two anthems, and a beautiful setting of 'Abide with Me,' as a soprano solo. There was no sermon, but the Rev. V. D. Davis, who conducted the service, gave a succession of readings, first from the Bible, Psalm cvii., and passages from the Epistle to the Philippians, and then from Connell's 'Book of Devotional Readings' the letter, as he said, of another "prisoner of the Lord," John Hus, addressed on the eve of his martyrdom, five hundred years ago, to the Bohemian people; and, finally, as a present-day testimony, passages bearing on the reality and power of religion among the men at the front from the letter of Corporal George Tarrant, which appeared recently in The Inquirer. The readings harmonised well together, and with the whole course of the service. The attendance, in spite of the darkened roads and church, was most encouraging.

Carmarthen.—Mr. G. H. Clennell writes: "I think the following particulars of work which students of our College at Carmarthen are doing at Fort Scoveston, Pembroke, may be of interest to your readers. The Board has given special leave of absence to parties of students who undertake the work, three men going at a time who are then replaced by another group. Prof. Stephens, who has special charge of the organisation of this work, writes to me as follows: 'Since the beginning of last term, our men have served in their turns for three weeks at a time; three men going together each time. The Y.M.C.A. Secretary for South Pembrokeshire area thought it advisable to retain the camp leader, who was already stationed at the Hut in Fort Scoveston. The camp leader was the Rev. J. S. Jenkins, a young curate from Swansea. He seems to have been very pleased with our men, and they on their part testify to their very happy association and co-operation with Mr. Jenkins. His presence in the camp secured the continuity that is so necessary, and relieved our men from a great deal of anxiety and responsibility. I ought to state that Fort Scoveston is one of the chief military centres in South Wales, and has been the scene of great activity amongst the soldiers. The Y.M.C.A. Hut is one of the best, and was presented by Sir Stafford and Lady Howard of Llanelly. I may illustrate the high esteem in which our men and their work are held by an incident which occurred during the Christmas holidays. During a very severe gale the roof was blown completely away a distance of 40 to 50 yards. The Y.M.C.A. authorities at Pembroke Dock immediately sent a message to our men stating that it might be best for them to leave the camp for a few days while repairs should be attended to. On hearing this the military authorities in the camp, most especially in the persons of Major Ready and Major De Rees, who have been stationed there for several months, informed our workers that the camp could not afford to lose them for a single day. They therefore brought up a large number of engineers, who saw to the immediate repairing of the roof, even neglecting their own huts which had also been badly damaged. The cry was raised: "We must save the Y.M.C.A. first." For a night or two our men were put up in one of the military huts, and received the utmost consideration from all concerned. I am afraid my letter is becoming too breezy to be a sober report of the work accomplished. However that may be, it has been most encouraging to hear the men relate their experiences amongst the soldiers. It has brought them into close contact with human nature in a new relationship, and has helped them to realise the value of a true and manly Christianity in the present European crisis. I have on several occasions received most glowing reports of the work done by the students. The Y.M.C.A. Secretary has more than once emphasised that our men are just the type required, for the essential thing is not merely to minister to the material comfort of the soldiers, but to create an unmistakable spiritual atmosphere which has a deep and lasting influence on their lives.'"

From a Home Camp.—Mr. J. D. Jones writes from a military camp "Somewhere in the South": "Your readers who are interested in the 'Home Camp Notes,' by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, will be glad to know that the work commenced by him in this camp 'Somewhere in the South' is being carried on in a practical way. Three weeks ago we were gathered together by private circular, and we had our service in the village which is three miles from the camp; but on Sunday last, by the kind permission of the chaplain, Capt. Scott, we were able to meet in the Nonconformist Church Hut. It was also a great pleasure to many of us, but quite a surprise to some of our acquaintances, to see an official announcement of our service in the Divisional Orders for the day. This latter recognition, we believe, was secured by the energies of Lieut. Bounds. The hut is picturesquely situated in a wood of firs, and the recent heavy snowfall added considerably to the normal charm of the surroundings. It was a unique experience, and as we made our way through the wood and over—and sometimes into—the deep and untrodden snow, our thoughts wandered to our ain folk and to their well-ordered churches. There was a simple charm about the little hut, with its plain military benches, and its warm stove and oil lamps. Our numbers were very small, especially after the huge assemblies at the morning Church Parades and the Y.M.C.A. 'Sacred Songs and Service.' The smallness of our numbers, however, did not detract from the value of our devotions, for in that hour we were in communion with God, and we thought not of the outward, physical forms of our neighbours. The service was conducted, and the sermon preached, by the Rev. Ralph Philipson, B.A., who through his work with the Y.M.C.A. here has come into personal contact with many of our lads, and we know is on very friendly terms with men here of all shades of opinion. One cannot pay too high a tribute to the splendid work done for the soldiers by the Y.M.C.A., and many of us shall be for ever grateful to that association. It is difficult, however, for the Y.M.C.A. here, with its huge gatherings, to get into personal relations with each man who enters its doors, and so there is an urgent need for the closer fellowship which our own gatherings provide. Our lads are especially fortunate in having the warm and active interest of Lieut. J. H. Bounds, 2/3rd East Lancs. F.A. and formerly a student of the H.M.C. Lieut. Bounds is energetically supported by Serjeant R. Rhodes, also of the 2/3rd East Lancs. F.A., and of our Oldham Road Church, Manchester. There are forty-two Unitarians in camp, and it is intended to have a religious service once a month and also a monthly week-night gathering.

London: Essex Church.—The Annual Meeting of the Essex Church congregation was held on February 23 at Lindsey Hall, Mr. Edgar Worthington in the chair. There has been a steady and continuous increase of attendance and membership during the past year, and the future outlook is full of hope and encouragement. Expression was made of a warm and unanimous appreciation of the earnest and inspiring ministry of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall and of the determination to work with him to further increase and widen the usefulness of the church. Last Sunday evening the Rev. Dr. A. Hurn took part in the service, and was warmly welcomed on his recovery from his illness contracted in Gallipoli on service in the R.A.M.C., and congratulated on his newly acquired degree of Doctor of Philosophy.—The following letter has been sent, on behalf of the Committee, to all members of the Church. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall will be very grateful if our readers can send him additional names, and thus aid this missionary effort in West London. "The Committee of the Church feel that the searchings of heart caused by the War impose upon us the duty of making our Church, its services and its message, known to a wider public. Believing that nothing but a Revived Faith, in God and the Human Soul, in the Supremacy of Righteousness, and in the Redeeming Power of Love, can make the present endurable or the future hopeful, we feel urgently moved to share this faith with others. A Publicity Sub-Committee has accordingly been appointed. One of their plans is to send out circulars. For this purpose it is necessary to have a large list of names. Every member of our congregation is hereby asked to increase this list. Please send the names (with addresses) of such persons, within reach of the Church, as are not known to be associated with any other Church or religious fellowship, to whom you think our Church would be a help. The larger the list you send, the more welcome it will be. We are acting at once; a reply to Mr. Weatherall, at Essex Manse, by return, will be a kindness; send your afterthoughts by a later post."

Nantwich.—Through the death of Miss Anne Parry the Nantwich Church has lost a good worker and a faithful member. She only had a short illness. After undergoing an operation she passed away at the local hospital in her 60th year on Wednesday, February 23rd. The interment took place the following Saturday. The large gathering that assembled, despite the inclemency of the weather, was a proof of the wide respect in which she was held. Previous to leaving for the public cemetery there was a short service in the chapel, which was conducted by the minister (the Rev. J. Park Davis), assisted by the Rev. T. P. Bullen (United Methodist). Last Sunday evening, the 5th inst., a memorial service was held in the chapel, when a good congregation of relatives and friends was again present. The pastor, who officiated, read extracts from appreciative messages that had been received from the Revs. Rowland V. Barker and W. A. Weatherall. The departed was in many ways an exceptional woman. She was one of those simple, quiet Christians who pour out their alabaster life-box of precious ointment freely and willingly in the service of their Master. She formed an interesting link with the Barker family. As Canon Barker put it: "She was a good and faithful friend and servant" to the late Philip Barker for the last twenty-five years of his life. Like her old master himself she was devoted to our Church and the cause it represents. She had been a member of the Committee for many years, and seldom was she absent from its meetings. Although she had little more of this world's possessions than what she had through her diligence earned, she yet has left small bequests both to the church and the Sunday school.

Northern Advisory Board.—Miss Helen Louise Phillips, having satisfied the Board that she has completed three years' good service as a Lay Worker and passed the prescribed examinations, has been granted the final certificate of qualification for the ministry.

Portsmouth.—Amid very impressive surroundings, the mortal remains of the late Mr. George Edward Pert, the Portsmouth victim of the sinking of the P. & O. liner, Maloja, were laid to rest at the Highland Road Cemetery on Saturday afternoon. The deceased, who was 32 years of age, was a skilled labourer in the boilermaker's shop at Portsmouth Dockyard, and was on the way to Malta Dockyard when the catastrophe occurred. His body was conveyed to his mother's residence in St. Thomas's Street—and the first portion of the service was conducted in the Unitarian Chapel by the Rev. T. Bond—thence to the cemetery, there being present his widow, mother and seven brothers, beside a large number of friends and workmates. From early life he was attached to the congregation at St. Thomas's Street. He leaves a widow and two young children. At the memorial service Mr. Bond referred to the fearful outrage on human life caused by this disaster.

Sidmouth.—The congregation at the Old Meeting is mourning the death of Mrs. James Samuelson, which took place last Sunday in the 82nd year of her age. Since her removal to Sidmouth four years ago she has lived in quiet retirement, but she was well known in the Liverpool district as an active philanthropist. With her husband she helped to found the Liverpool Service Camp for girls in Wallasey about twenty-two years ago. It has been of great benefit to destitute girls in Liverpool and Birkenhead, and has received recognition from the Liverpool Corporation. Hundreds of poor girls of school age have been enabled in this way to enjoy an annual holiday. The funeral took place on Tuesday, the service being conducted by the Rev. T. Bowen Evans, M.A.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A Shakespeare Hut.

The site of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre, near the British Museum, has been offered to the Y.M.C.A. for the period of the war by the Shakespeare Memorial Committee for the erection of a hut or huts for soldiers. Prof. Gollancz, who will be glad to receive subscriptions towards this object at King's College, states that the land will allow of three huts, one of which might be used as a recreation hut, another for cubicles to accommodate four or five hundred men, and a third as a canteen. Mr. Bernard Shaw and others have strongly opposed the utilisation for this purpose of any money from the funds which they have in hand, and which were subscribed for another object, but it has been decided that a sum of £1,000 shall, if possible, be raised independently for the purpose of providing a Shakespeare hut. This hut, which will be designed in the Elizabethan style, will now be temporarily erected on the site for the use of soldiers.

Among the valuable literary relics which Mr. Edmund Gosse has gathered together for the Red Cross Sale at Christie's are some treasures from the Rev. Stopford Brooke's collection, including a rare Shelley MS. which was given to him by Jane Lady Shelley in 1894. The MS. is really the first draft of Shelley's little known essay on 'Life,' written in a notebook, enriched with some curious jottings. Another valuable gift is a beautiful first edition of Byron's 'Hours of Idleness,' his first publication, and Rossetti's signed copy of Swinburne's 'Atalanta,' the cover of which was designed by Rossetti.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

NEXT week we hope to publish an account by Mrs. Bernard Allen of her recent visit to France. The tour of inspection has been a very successful one. Important arrangements have been made in personal interviews and many new needs discovered. The plans for the Hut for rest and recreation, which we have promised to provide for the Belgian soldiers at the base, have been settled, and the chaplains who will be in charge of it are full of hope and enthusiasm at the prospect which it opens up of nobler influence among the men. Now we hear that there is urgent need of a similar Hut on a smaller scale just behind the firing-line. All this will cost money, and still more money, but our pockets are not empty, our cupboards are not bare, and hearts full of generosity are to be found everywhere. We on our part are doing our best to make the money go as far as possible, and nothing is wasted. May we call special attention to the list of wants for the "Rose Allen" Hospital for Refugee Children at Yvetôt, which we publish to-day.

SHORTLY before her return home we received from Mrs. Allen a most interesting account of a visit to the hospice for refugees which we have been supporting for several months. It is still continuing its beneficent work as an asylum of rest and safety for many weary women and little children on their journey of exile. Sometimes as many as twenty children find shelter and refreshment there for the night as they travel from some place which has become dangerous to a "Colonie Scolaire Belge" further south. But the following passage will enable our readers to see the work with their own eyes:—"We arrived here on Monday afternoon from Paris, and found the weather just as bad as it could be—snow, hail, sleet, and underfoot beyond words! You know C——, and it was at its very worst, and has been ever since! We went off at once to see Madame L——, and as she was not at home we went on to the hospice. A sad-faced woman opened the door, and called the sister, who is in charge, to see us. We went first into the dining-room, which was very clean and neat, with long table and chairs and a few little pictures—of the King and Queen, and so on—about, and some flower-pots tied up with Belgian colours. We then went into the kitchen, where we found the woman who let us in, and her beautiful little boy of 2½ years, eating his supper of soup and bread very heartily, in fact, too heartily to take any interest in us. The mother is French—her husband disappeared a year ago. She rather pathetically asked us if we thought he might still be living? What could we say? The child, whom she evidently adored, is her one consolation, and she is now living at the hospice to do the cooking and cleaning, and generally to help, as she is of better class and education than the refugees generally."

"IN another room," Mrs. Allen continues, "there was a mother sitting by the fire with a month old baby on her knee, too utterly crushed to care to say a word. She just rocked herself to and fro, and held the baby close. Three little children were in the room, two of them were in their village last week with their mother—a bomb fell and the mother was torn to bits and killed before their eyes! They bore traces of their terror still, but can play about happily now. Only at night they still have nightmares, and the sister cannot keep them quiet in their beds. In a corner of the room sat an old woman with her pillow on her lap, while her withered old fingers went on throwing the bobbins mechanically to and fro, and a piece of lace grew as I watched. There were other inmates, fourteen in all that evening, all women and children, as it has been decided to exclude men altogether. A week or two ago Madame L—— was suddenly asked to take in sixteen children and two ladies who were bringing them down to a 'Colonie Scolaire,' and she never knows how many or how few may claim our hospitality."

WE wish that some of our people would remember that "I serve" is a much nobler motto that "I criticise" or "I object." We are being severely tried in these days not by our sufferings and privations but by our security and the softness of living which is still possible to us. These are the things which more than anything else seduce us from the high loyalty of soul which alone is worthy of us. A certain inertness of imagination seems to blind us to the fact that for our Allies the struggle is far more tragic and terrible than it is for ourselves. And so we find ourselves engaged over small points of domestic controversy while Europe is in flames; or we sulk and grumble behind our barriers because our leaders do not make a quick job of the war. We know that this is not the real spirit of the nation, and at the first sign of a serious menace to our safety we believe it would disappear. But it is just in these days of watching and waiting that we must support those who bear the burden of the State by generous encouragement, by large and unselfish views of our own duty, by quick obedience, and by the stern repression of all frivolous objections and personal complaints.

We are in complete agreement with The Spectator when it pleads that people who engineer attacks upon the Government in general and the Prime Minister in particular, are morally bound to suggest an alternative. A war ministry must be either supported or rejected. Lukewarm middle courses can only lead to disaster. To indulge in a campaign of suspicion and innuendo and stop short of impeachment is simply to play into the hand of the enemy. "The moment a Chatham appears above the horizon we will all clasp him to our bosoms. Till then let us not hunt chimeras, but get on with the war with the instruments which we have at hand." This is sound advice. But for ourselves we would go a great deal further. We do not admit that a more impulsive and imperious man than Mr. Asquith would have done better for the country. It is just in his patience, his coolness of judgment, his capacity to take the people with him, that he has shown political genius and proved himself to be the man for the hour. A Prime Minister who had tried to rush the country against its habits and convictions at the beginning of the war would almost certainly have landed us in disaster. Let the critics and the grumblers say what they will, what has been accomplished is simply staggering, both in its efficiency and its magnificence. And behind it all there is a united people.

A good deal is being said about the sacrifices which are being demanded from the married men who have attested under Lord Derby's scheme. We have no desire to understate them in any degree, and we hope that they will receive the most generous consideration which the circumstances permit. But it seems right to remember that sacrifice is of the essence of the situation. Tens of thousands of men joined the army in the first few months from a deep instinct of duty, knowing quite well that they were risking all their earthly prospects and the future welfare and happiness of their dependents. We heard little about it because it was their own free-will offering to the country's need. In our discussion of the hardship imposed upon the men who are joining now, the richness and spontaneity of this initial sacrifice must always be borne in mind. There is, perhaps, a little danger, now that the first impulse of self-devotion has spent its force, to regard national service as a matter of bargain with the State, as though in joining the army a man were serving an alien master instead of accepting his share in the defence of his own hearth and home.

The formation of a new Non-Combatant Corps affords fresh evidence of the anxiety of the Government to do all in its power to meet the case of the genuine conscientious objector. It is clear that the young men who are pleading for exemption before the Tribunals, cannot simply be left to their own devices. They cannot renounce the citizenship which they have enjoyed without a murmur ever since they were born, just at the moment when the country is in peril and something hard and disagreeable is demanded of them. Those of them who really understand what a solemn thing it is to refuse grave public duty in the name of conscience will be eager to do everything in their power to prove that they are not asking to escape from hardship and danger. They will accept an alternative without a murmur, and feel that it is only fair that there should be the same interference with their daily life and habit as in the case of a soldier.

For we are face to face with a much more serious danger than the possibility of doing violence here and there to a sensitive and highly trained conscience The reports of cases of "conscientious objection" which have appeared in the newspapers are helping to debase the moral currency. Thousands of men are saying to themselves, if conscience involves this crankiness of mind, this lack of manly fibre, and this shallow contempt for public interest, then the less of conscience we have the better. There are two ways in which this danger can be met. For ourselves we would say with all the emphasis in our power that if we want to see conscience at work we must go not to the tribunals but to the camps. The highest forms of conscientiousness lead men towards their country's need not away from it. The quiet dignity with which our sons, our brothers, our friends have gone forth, without any military glamour, simply because it was their duty to go and the cause is just, is the most splendid proof of the living power of conscience which we can possibly desire.

But there is also a duty which must be discharged by the objectors themselves. We speak not to the cranks but to the noble-hearted among them. They must adorn their doctrine and make it beautiful in the eyes of brave men. Hitherto they have failed to do this. Their programme seems to most people to be one of negations. Conscience limits itself to an act of refusal to do anything to preserve our liberties or to defend our country. To put it quite frankly there is nothing inspiring or attractive about this attitude, and no man of generous temper wants to agree with it. Can it under present circumstances be made anything else? It is for the conscientious objector to prove that it can or to find himself driven off the field by moral ideals loftier and more animating than his own. He can at least try in his personal life to prove his right to plead in the name of conscience by his eagerness to accept for himself as heavy a burden of suffering and sacrifice as falls to the lot of others.

We have received an important communication from the "State Children's Association," signed by Lord Lytton as Chairman, and Mrs. Barnett as Hon. Secretary, on the increase of juvenile crime, especially among boys. "The darkened streets, the lessened number of police, and the absence of social workers from boys' clubs, church brigades, and scout organisations, all have their widespread effect. To these, though not a consequence of the war, must be added the exciting influences of sensational cinema shows, inciting imaginative youth to imitation." The letter points out the interesting fact that while similar accounts of an increase in juvenile offences come from Germany, this is not the case with France. "This may be because the French Minister of Education, in March, 1915, addressed a circular to the local authorities, urging them to enforce more rigorously than ever the usual regulations as to school attendance."

The object of the letter is to suggest that if the children are to be saved at this crisis it must be through friendship and not through penal measures. It closes with the following practical appeal:—

> With all the earnestness born of a long experience of work for children, we would appeal to the public, and in particular to women of education and experience, to take up the task of befriending those boys who are rapidly graduating for citizenship. Let them offer themselves (a) to the Justices of the Children's Courts as Probation Officers for one, two, or more children as their time permits; (b) for work in connection with boys' clubs and kindred organisations, many of which are in abeyance for lack of helpers; (c) as guides for educational visits to places of public interest, and in every personal way to counteract the lack of recreative occupation which has left the children more than ever open to the abnormal influences of the times.

Why is Romain Rolland's book, 'Above the Battle' so disappointing? To say that it stands apart from most war books in the beauty of its writing and the unselfishness of its ideals is faint praise, for it is by one of our few master minds who is also an artist in words. It contains many things which are deeply interesting, and others for which we are sincerely grateful; there are passages as fine in their spiritual perception as they are noble in style; thoughts inspired by the just judgment and the brotherly kindness, which men of coarser fibre forget in the excitement of conflict, glow with a quiet lustre in his pages. And yet we close the book dissatisfied, and it seems worth while to ask ourselves why.

But let us first of all pause to pay our debts, and we can do so best by quoting two passages which exhibit both the national and the human sentiments of the author in the purest light. M. Rolland bears the sufferings of his country in his heart, and he has a Frenchman's scorn for the brutal fury which destroys the fairest memorials of her national life.

> Our France [he writes] which bleeds with so many other wounds, has suffered nothing more cruel than the attack against her Parthenon, the Cathedral of Rheims....A piece of architecture like Rheims is much more than one life; it is a people whose centuries vibrate like a symphony in this organ of stone. It is their memorial of joy, of glory, and of grief, their meditations, ironies, dreams. It is the tree of the race whose roots plunge to the profoundest depth of its soil, and whose branches stretch with a sublime élan towards the sky. It is still more; its beauty which soars above the struggles of nations is the harmonious response made by the human race to the riddle of the world—this light of the spirit more necessary to souls than that of the sun. Whoever destroys this work murders more than a man; he murders the purest soul of a race.
> Let the men who clamour for reprisals on Cologne consider these words and the sharp sting of their rebuke, remembering that "a great nation does not revenge itself, it re-establishes justice."

The second passage is a plea for the sovereignty of thought and spiritual endeavour, a warning that even now the finely tempered soul must not prostitute its gifts to the service of anything lower than the good of humanity.

> Even in time of war [he reminds us] it remains a crime for finer spirits to compromise the integrity of their thought....For the finer spirits of Europe there are two dwelling-places: our earthly fatherland, and that other City of God. Of the one we are the guests, of the other the builders. To the one let us give our lives and our faithful hearts; but neither family, friend nor fatherland, nor aught that we love has power over the spirit. The spirit is the light. It is our duty to lift it above tempests and thrust aside the clouds which threaten to obscure it; to build higher and stronger, dominating the injustice and hatred of nations, the walls of that city wherein the souls of the whole world may assemble.

Many of us, as we are whirled along in the tumult, need this grave reminder, and we hope that none will be too obstinate for his own opinions to take it to heart. But even as we listen we seem to catch the faint breath of something which is not wholly good. Is it meant that the élite of the human race, its artists and poets, its thinkers and priests, should stand above the struggles of ordinary men and offer the medicine of their ideals to the miseries which they do not share? Many pages of M. Rolland's book are infected with this spirit of detachment. Its title, 'Above the Battle,' suggests the lonely hill-top vision of the spectator. Here, if we mistake not, is the source of much of its weakness—its superficial view of the real causes of the war, its conventional judgment of Russia, its sad preference for warning and rebuke, its general insensibility to the fine bearing and temperate spirit of the Allied countries in a war which they hate and did nothing to provoke. We are deeply conscious of the bitter disappointments which the war has brought to the friends of international ideals all over Europe, and among them M. Rolland must occupy a chief place; but the cure for disillusion is not to retire to some neutral zone above the battle, where we can keep our dreams of peace and goodwill whole and unstained till the day of their return to the forum and the market-place. They must be brought to the sharp test of facts; they must be searched out mightily by the fierce winds which blow over the fields where men suffer and die; and we ourselves must win our right to help the world in the future by the steadiness and courage with which we do our duty now.

Here then is the root of our dissatisfaction. We need heartening comradeship in the common struggle, the health of soul which comes through bearing our burden together with a sense of the gladness and glory of sacrifice, and M. Rolland gives us musings from a lonely watch-tower instead. He is, indeed, no pacifist, and a hundred sentences reveal that he is quite definitely on the side of France in the war and desires victory for her arms. But he is not quite happy in his choice. His patriotism is mingled with fears and regrets. He could have played the part of a neutral with a grander air. And so he is at best a minor prophet, a little futile and pathetic in his own despite, never striking quite home to the moral heart of our problem, never thrilled by the spectacle of whole peoples going forth to battle in defence of justice and freedom. As we read these pages we find our minds travelling back to the dreams of harmony and contentment which were to come so quickly in the days before the flood. We begin to taste the poisoned sweetness of regret. Then, in a flash we remember that we are here not to wish that things had been otherwise, but to do our duty in the world as it is. To carry it through with stern determination is the only way to serve the need of the present hour and to create a better future for mankind. We must fight valiantly as well as love tenderly, if we would keep the treasures of the soul. "No man having put his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the Kingdom of God." These are words of warning and protection to write on the door-posts of our house and to bind as frontlets between our eyes. They will banish paralysing regrets and save us from the sin of simply watching the tumult from afar.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Dagworth.—Thousands of souls must leave this prison-house,
To be exalted to those heavenly fields
Where songs of triumph, palms of victory,
Where peace and joy and love and calm content
Sit singing in the azure clouds, and strew
Flowers of heaven's growth over the banquet-table.
Bind ardent hope upon your feet like shoes,
Put on the robe of preparation!
The table is prepared in shining heaven,
The flowers of immortality are blown;
Let those that fight fight in good steadfastness,
And those that fall shall rise in victory.

William Blake
('King Edward the Third.')

Perhaps it is what I have seen of the misery and worthlessness of human life (few have seen more), together with the extraordinary power which God has put into the hands of quite ordinary people (if they would but use it) for raising mankind out of this misery and worthlessness, which has given me this intense and ever present feeling of an Eternal Life leading to perfection for each and for every one of us, by God's laws.

Florence Nightingale.

Give me, O Lord, purity of lips, a clean and innocent heart, and rectitude of action. Give me humility, patience, abstinence, chastity, prudence, justice, fortitude, temperance. Give me the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and strength, the Spirit of knowledge and godliness, and of Thy fear. Make me ever to seek Thy face with all my heart, all my soul, all my mind; grant me to have a contrite and humble heart in Thy presence and to prefer nothing to Thy love. Amen.

OUT OF DOORS IN MARCH.

March came in like a lamb, if mere absence of bluster constitutes a lamb-like entry. All through the mild days of the first weeks of February promises of an unusually early spring abounded. If St. Valentine cared to look for such things he would, on his own festival, have found yellow hazel catkins shedding pollen on the tiny pistillate flowers growing on the same twigs. I do not remember to have seen in any previous year such a wealth of these ruby-coloured flowerets. Many people who admire and even gather the trailing catkins never see, do not even suspect, the presence of these minute crimson stars, dotted about on the hazel bushes. This year they have been so abundant that only the hopelessly unobservant can have failed to notice them. On sheltered slopes lying open to the morning sun the larches showed specks of green some weeks ago, the pear tree buds swelled early, as did those of the lilac, and the trailing honeysuckles in the coppice had unfolded so many green leaves that the birds thought that the winter was surely over, and began mating rather before their usual time. Even in January one trustful pair of starlings at Braithwaite, in Cumberland, had gone so far as to make a nest; the brood hatched out early in February. Of the sixteen birds which may, on a liberal calculation, be expected to sing in February the greater number could be heard producing trial notes as they sat on wet branches under a grey sky. The dullness and the drizzle did not deter them; it was open weather; grubs could be had without much grubbing; and when the rain clouds parted now and again so as to let a few feeble sunbeams pass, flies could be seen to dance in small parties above stagnant pools, over damp patches of the high road, and even in sheltered nooks on the lower fells.

On a topmost bough of an oak or poplar the thrush continued and improved on the attempts at voice production which had occupied him at intervals on very mild days in December and January. He was then very careful not to overtask his powers. It was amusing to hear him begin a practice. He seemed to be trying to sing in a whisper, as though not sure of hitting the desired note, and being afraid the other birds might detect blunders or hoarseness, and laugh at him. The criticism of a rival thrush cannot be a light matter.

By the eve of St. Valentine, however, he had gained confidence, and sang his two or three notes more boldly. In a few minutes he felt able to add another note, or even a short trill. Next day the same hour found him on the same spot. The overture was run over once or twice, then suddenly he knew that he had arrived; he flung aside all shyness, all care for his throat, and as the delicate scent of the closely clustered elm-blossoms on a neighbouring tree-top was wafted to him on a breeze from the south, he gave us the old familiar strain which each of us syllabised as our fancy dictated. It reached this listener's ears as "Judy, Judy! How-d'you-do? Pick it up! Pick it up!" There is more than one bird lover who delights in the music of the thrush and yet feels just a little bit jealous for the smaller birds who are too often out-voiced by this favourite of poet and painter. But for him, more ample justice would be done to the song of the hedge-sparrow, whose pretty warble has been uttered in mild weather right through the winter. The robin holds his own fairly well against the thrush, but it is chiefly because he does not need a tall tree top for a platform, but will sing from rail or bush within four feet of your open door or window. The "fee-dle, fee-dle" of the great tit is so monotonous that one is not sorry to have its wearisome reiteration interrupted or overpowered. But the great tit has a song which is not so penetrating and insistent as this call note. It is this song which is only heard when the noisy thrush is silent, and not often even then.

The thrushes like to sing on the outer edge of a wood, or one of a small group of trees; but if you go into the heart of a wood in early spring you are sure to hear the clear "te-tzoo, te-tzoo" of the cole-tit, the little black and grey bird with white cheeks and a dab of white on his black nape. It is this white dab which distinguishes him from the marsh-tit, which closely resembles him.

The rivers, full fed by melting snow, are still haunted, especially near towns or villages, by the brown-headed gulls, usually called black-headed, but the colour of the hood in summer is really a warm chocolate.

The brown hoods are assumed gradually. Already many of these gulls are changing white head feathers for brown ones. The ploughman—may we not now add ploughwoman?—is closely attended by parties of these gulls. No sooner are thirty yards, or even less, of new furrow turned up than these graceful birds alight on the damp soil, still gleaming from contact with the polished plough-share, and snatch eagerly at the fat grubs and larvæ so suddenly exposed. The farmer knows his friends, and a scaregull is an unknown institution, though sometimes a dead gull is seen hanging on a scarecrow, put there, perhaps, because the gull is more confiding than the rook, and more likely to come within gunshot. Snow seldom lies long in March, and when warmer winds blow and the white covering has disappeared from the valley floor and the lower fells, the blackbird will begin to vie with the thrush in eager song, and his mellower, more passionate, but less joyous strain will be heard from snow-white pear boughs, or the sunny side of the hawthorn hedge.

SERBIAN RELIEF FUND.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Will you please allow me a few lines in your widely read newspaper to express my heartfelt gratitude to your many readers who have responded so kindly to the Serbian Relief Fund, for which I made an appeal first on February 23, 1915, and again on December 10, the same year? FIGHT FOR RIGHT MOVEMENT.

MEETING AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

A LARGELY attended meeting in connection with the Fight for Right Movement was held on Monday afternoon, March 13, at the Mansion House, the Lord Mayor presiding. Among those present on the platform, in addition to the speakers, were the Lady Mayoress, Mr. Robert Bridges, Sir Cecil Harcourt Smith, Lady Brassey, Lady Pollock, Monsignor Moyes, Mrs. Stuart Moore (Evelyn Underhill), the Rev. H. Gow, and Miss Busk. The Hon. Secretary, Mr. Robinson Smith, stated that letters expressing agreement with the objects of the Movement or regrets at inability to be present had been received from Mr Balfour, Mr. D. Maclean, M.P., Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir Henry Newbolt, and Mr. Arthur Stanley (British Red Cross Society).

The Lord Mayor, in welcoming those present to the Mansion House, and expressing his sympathy with the purpose actuating the Fight for Right Movement, emphasised the fact that the nation was fighting in a just, noble, and righteous cause, and that, having absolute faith in its ultimate triumph, they were prepared to make every sacrifice in the furtherance of this object. They must keep steadily before the country the ideals for which they were striving, and constantly and unceasingly show their significance and importance in order to hearten the people in the conflict. They must have faith, as Abraham Lincoln had said, "that right makes might," and, in the light of that, dare to do their duty to the end.

The Bishop of Winchester said that the occasion was unique. The nation was faced by a quite unprecedented challenge, whether they measured it in terms of men, or money, or munitions. The appeal made to its chivalry by the peril of Belgium and the instant response to that appeal were, however, spiritual in their nature, and it was a spiritual force which made the homes of England send out their sons to danger and death, and made the women fling away their amusements and embark on great works of mercy. This truth needed to be reiterated, especially when there was a tendency to quarrel among ourselves, to spend time in mutual recriminations which dissipated our energies at a time when every effort ought to be concentrated on the task in hand. For Great Britain and her Allies, but especially for Great Britain, the first thing of importance was to keep up the energy of her purpose and the spirit of her chivalry. It was a great thing to fight well; but it was a greater thing to fight with a high knowledge of what it was for which they fought. A great war like this, if fought in the temper that ennobles a great nation, might leave behind it a precious legacy, not only to our children and grandchildren, but to our great-great-grand-children. If their League did its work well, it would not be bounded by these shores. They had received from the Dominions an amazing gift of loyalty and courage for which it would be well if they could make an honourable and respectful return. They also wanted the neutral countries to know what their spirit was, as they knew the glorious spirit of France. He hoped they would not be prevented from issuing publications setting forth their ideals by lack of funds. Such a paper as he had recently listened to by Mr. Buchan, which had sent him home vibrating with high emotion, ought to be printed and distributed by the hundred thousand.

Mr. Appleton, Secretary of the General Federation of Trade Unions, spoke with enthusiasm of the spirit of the workers, and their absolute determination to carry on the war till triumph was assured. He, personally, had never hated war as he hated it at that moment, and yet he was quite convinced that they ought to go through with it to the end, for there was no question in the mind of any sane person that they were fighting for the right. The sacrifices which had been made and the achievements which had been accomplished, in spite of our unpreparedness for war, were almost past belief, and he thought when the time came to learn the truth that it would astound those who were inclined to grumble and criticise now.

Dr. Jacks, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, spoke as follows:—I want to underline the first word of the Fight for Right Movement. For my part I take that word in a somewhat literal sense. To me it is no mere figure of speech. It does not mean that we are engaged in a controversy about the origins of the war, or that we have formed this Movement merely for the purpose of discussing and proving the righteousness of our cause. It does not mean that we are conducting a mere wordy battle about militarism or pacifism, or that we are occupied in the easy process of killing the Germans with our mouths. No, it is something far more serious than that. We, as civilians, are prepared to endure hardness and losses, to practise self-sacrifice, and to face all the dangers and difficulties that the service of a righteous cause may require. The Fight for Right means that we want to send a message to the brave men at the front, telling them that we, as citizens, are with them and behind them, and that they can count on us to the end. I am sure I speak for others as well as for myself when I say, I want to be able to look those men in the face when they come back. It will be a somewhat stern ordeal for all of us. There will be something in these men's eyes and manner which will say to us, "What were you doing when we were fighting your battles? What hardships were you facing. What risks were you running? What self-sacrifices were you practising in that great day when we were risking our lives?" Now, what are we going to answer to that? Are we to be content to say to these men, "We talked a great deal about the war, we abused the Germans and criticised the Government, and admired you for the heroism you displayed, and were very sorry for the killed and the wounded; but, for the rest, we spent our time very much as usual?"

I am very sorry for the man who will have no better answer than that upon his lips when he looks in the face of his sons when they come back from the front. That man will feel all the shame and humiliation which properly come to an individual when he stands in the presence of those who have done their duty, and knows that he has not done his own. That is one of the reasons why I joined the Fight for Right Movement. I was getting a little tired of talking and writing about the right; I wanted to fight for it. Of course, I knew very well that this movement would not put a gun into my hands, but I did think that by banding ourselves together in this way we should discover our duty more clearly, get rid more effectively of our criticisms and unnecessary complaints, and that having learnt together what our public duty is, we should also encourage one another to do it. It would help to make us all fighters for the right in a sense not unworthy of the men who are fighting at the front, and enable us to give them a good answer to their questions when they return. And what is the enemy whom this Fight for Right Movement is going to fight? Ultimately it is Germany, who, to the astonishment of the world, has revived that barbarous spirit which builds itself up on the abasement and oppression of other nations; but we cannot get at that enemy. We must begin with one nearer home—ourselves. I am no ascetic, I hope I am no sour-faced Puritan, but I do say that the duty of every civilian in this crisis is to lay aside his pleasures, to abandon his habits of self-indulgence, to give up every form of luxury, and to live a hard life of self-denial until the struggle is over. That is what I mean by the Fight for Right, and it is a very difficult fight. I venture to think that it becomes easier if we try to do the difficult thing together. That is why a concerted movement like this is so valuable; it brings home to us all what are the high moral reasons and the grave economic reasons which make it an absolute duty to make these sacrifices. We have first of all to act ourselves, then we have to persuade other people to do it. This Movement wants a great army of missionaries who will be content to do their work in the homes of the people, at the street corners, in the factories, and at the pit-head. What we want is not so much great meetings but intense personal work. Our missionaries should go to places where wages are high and where money is plentiful, and where ever they can gather together half a dozen women or a dozen men they should hold up to them the standard of public duty, explain to them the tremendous nature of the crisis we are passing through, and preach to them the gospel of thrift and self-denial. It would be well if we were to go about this business in the way that the Salvation Army has gone about theirs—not with brass bands and drums, but with self-devotion, flexible organisation, and intense personal work. Wherever you can persuade a man or a woman to save 5*s*. a week you have dealt an effective blow against the enemy. One of the best things which I have read about the war is the remark of a French officer to Rudyard Kipling that Germany has revealed to us what evil is: the power behind her is naked evil, and our task, therefore, is not only to fight for right, it is to fight against the foulest form of wrong that has ever been attempted in the history of the world. And that fact seems to me to give to this Movement a genuinely religious character. Religion is something very much more than the fight for right, and yet I cannot help thinking that no religion is worthy the name if it shrinks from the fight for right when the challenge goes forth.

The Right Hon. Andrew Fisher, High Commissioner for Australia, in a forcible speech, bore testimony to the absolute determination of the Dominions to sacrifice everything in this fight for human liberty against the might of a tyrannous aggressor. Nothing we could give was too much at such a crisis. It was far better that their sons should die honourably facing the foe, than that they should be enslaved in mind as well as body after the heroic stand for justice and freedom which our forefathers had made in the past. He was not blaming the Germans for fighting for their country, and he did not hold all Germans equally responsible for the war; but we were fighting for a great ideal which the lovers of freedom in Germany desired as ardently as we, and his hope was that as a result of this war, though the ideal was, perhaps, a distant one, we should have an organised group of nations ready to deal with tyrant nations in the same way as the policeman deals with the outlaw in his native town. There was no doubt about the mission we were engaged in; it was a fight, in the name of that ethical justice which ennobles a people, for all that was greatest and best in the world.

Other speeches enforcing the same note of self-sacrifice for a noble end were made by the Chief Rabbi, Sir Edward Beauchamp, M.P. (Hon. Treasurer), (who concluded an earnest appeal by inviting those present to become supporters of the Movement); and Monsignor Bickerstaffe-Drew (John Ayscough), who urged that they should make their work a message of encouragement to the soldiers at the front, among whom he had been for the past fourteen months, and that they should not grow weary and desire to hurry things unduly when the strain of waiting for the final triumph became irksome and they were inclined to become weary.

The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor, proposed by Sir Francis Younghusband, the founder of the Movement.

THE NORTH END DOMESTIC MISSION.

(From a Liverpool Correspondent.)

Annual Meetings, like persons, differ greatly in temperament. The collective spirit of a meeting is more than the sum of the individual spirits of which it is composed; it partakes, in fact,—we say it with bated breath—of the characteristics of the mob. That is why we come away from meetings, composed often of practically the same persons, with curiously different feelings. How often we have known that which is divine in us, ready to tremble into life under the touch of an inspired and consecrated spirit, shrink back into futility at the clash of opportunist, or uncharitable, or materialistic speech. And how often, too, has our faith in the divine, in man, and in the universe, been stirred and strengthened because by some happy chance or choice the right people spoke to us at a meeting as fellow-pilgrims of eternity.

There is a certain Annual Meeting in Liverpool where this antithesis between the higher and the lower values is never forced upon us. It is usually a small affair in point of numbers; a few ministers, a few sympathetic laymen and women, the same persons, practically, brought together by the same sequence of events year after year. We meet, it is true, on the official occasion, but there is very little of the official, the artificial, or the clever about it. The possibilities of a world where simple love of men and women as they are is the rule of life, not the text of a discourse—the master motive, permeated by the poetry of the soul we call religion—confront us. This is the meeting of the North End Domestic Mission, and it took place this year on March 8, under the presidency of Mr. C. Sydney Jones, Chairman of the Mission. To it, undeterred by the darkness of the streets and the dim religious light of the Ancient Chapel Room interior, came the usual small band to listen, to speak simply, and to go away refreshed.

"Never many people at that little meeting," was the remark of the Chairman to the writer next morning, "but always such a good meeting. And I believe Mr. Haigh understands and likes it like that." Incredible as it sounds to the self-advertising, it really seems that he does, which should be a comfortable reflection for all who are so ready to take a religious effort of the first rank in Liverpool on trust.

The Chairman, in a brief speech, emphasised the loyal feeling of the subscribers for Mr. Haigh. There was the same thing to express every year: admiration for his work at the North End. One great thing was occupying all our minds at this tragic moment, and the work was not easy to carry on in face of it; but we did feel in our hearts that our contest was for a great ideal, and of that ideal Hamilton Road had been profoundly conscious. It was really a fine tribute to the justice of our cause that fifty-two of Mr. Haigh's young men had given up all for it; and some had given their lives.

The Rev. C. Craddock seconded the Chairman's tribute in very appreciative terms. He always read Mr. Haigh's report with much interest and even envy of the power and activity manifested at the Mission. Mr. Haigh had the power of expressing things so that people realized and felt them. He was always greatly sensible of the true value of this work.

In his reply Mr. Haigh touched chiefly on two points: The effect of the war upon his people, and the drink question. He showed how the feeling awakened by the war varied according to temperament, and bore witness to the sacrifices willingly made by some families, especially those whose sons went first on that first rich and noble impulse. By a series of gradations one arrived, he said, at those who seemed quite callous, who had sent no volunteers, who were making money—often large sums—out of the war, whose personal comfort had increased by means of it, who made no sacrifices, who seemed to recognise no obligation as having any reference to themselves. At one end of the scale were those whose religious feeling, made more poignant by sacrifice, circled round the war, paradox of horror and nobility as it was; at the other were the people to whom the war meant—making more money. He had even heard it said: "I'm glad we have nothing to do with it," and other men were dying that these might live in enhanced comfort. Another contrast forced itself upon him: the churches closing at 6.30 and the public-houses opening. The great people of the land were preaching economy and economy; the greatest waste of all waste was allowed to go on. So much more money, so much more drink. Were we really going on allowing these heroes of ours to come back and fall into the same old snares? Khaki we could not insult; but what was more horrible than a drunken soldier? We dared not touch the drink, and so that stupendous evil and supreme wastefulness was left at our very door. Even now it was sapping our vitality. Those who lived among the people knew that. Drink was the cancer of England. We were fighting for righteousness, and yet we were letting this curse rage on in our midst. We had the chance to stop it now—now when people would accept anything—and we did not stop it. Leaving this point Mr. Haigh said that it was a sort of triumph to know the appeal their work made to certain minds. Orthodoxy had its spectacular people and pageants and prestige; Nonconformity had its emotional and gospel appeal. They at their Mission had no sensational appeal, or appeal of wealth or power, yet they got home to a certain section of the community of the poor (though, for the moment, poverty was almost gone) that but for them would be churchless. The young men they had lost were their actual workers who had been keeping the place going. They must have had an influence in their new place. The experience of these, and also of our ministers who had given themselves, should be a splendid testimony of the working value of real religion. He wished to say there how the Rev. H. D. Roberts had got, now more than ever, the true admiration of Hamilton Road.

The Rev. H. W. Hawkes said that year after year they came with the same appreciation of this noble work and then they left Mr. Haigh alone for another year. Mr. Haigh was impressed with the necessity of making religion a tremendously real thing. He agreed with him about the drink and the failure in our rulers of the moral courage to grapple with it. The war was in many ways ennobling us; the drink was degrading us. It was, he knew, no use raving there, but moral indignation should be kept alive. One of the joys of his life of too many failures was that he had discovered Mr. Haigh.

The Rev. J. C. Odgers glanced back at the time when he first set foot in the mission, and bade his hearers look on this picture and on that. "Which of us ministers," he said, "can show the real success in our ministry that is shown by Mr. and Mrs. Haigh, and their religious and spiritual force?"

The resolution for the appointment of the Committee for the ensuing year was moved by the Rev. J. C. Hirst and seconded by Mrs. H. D. Roberts. These added their tribute of gratitude for the beautiful service carried on unostentatiously and with utter faithfulness by the missionary and his wife. A hearty vote of thanks was proposed by Mr. Kenneth Cook to Mr. C. Sydney Jones for his services as President of the Mission and as Chairman of its Committee.

THE LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Fifty-Fourth Annual Meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association was held on Saturday, March 11, in the Hope Street Church Hall, Liverpool. The meeting was well attended, practically all the churches in the district being represented. The President of the Association, Mr. A. S. Thew, was in the chair. The Report and Statement of Accounts for the year 1915 were, on the motion of the President, seconded by Miss H. M. Johnson, unanimously adopted. The Report of the Association was declared by Miss Johnson to be a most optimistic one. In the circumstances of the times the Report naturally showed little in the way of any forward movement on the part of the Association; but much had been done during the year in bringing the churches and ministers of the district into much closer union with each other, in awakening the sense of common life, and in quietly preparing for the future. The Report recorded the fact that, during the year, three prominent members of the Association had joined the army, these being the Lay Secretary, Mr., now Major, B. P. Burroughs (with a battery in France), the Rev. H. D. Roberts, Minister at Large (now in France with the 10th Labour Battalion, R.E.), and the Rev. W. Short of Bootle (now in training with the Inns of Court O.T.C., London). A special resolution was proposed by the President, seconded by the Rev. C. Craddock, and carried unanimously, expressing the respect of the members of the Association for these friends in their loyalty to conscience, and their prayerful hope for a speedy and safe return for them. The Report recorded the interesting fact that a Lay Preachers' Union had been established for the district on a firm basis. The Report concluded with the following paragraph:—"Your Council feel that this Report is, perhaps, somewhat bare and meagre, and does not show any marked forward movement. But, as every one must, they realise that the circumstances of our times are not propitious for advance: the thought and energy of men and women are naturally concentrated in one particular direction, and no one feels ready to launch out into new spheres of enterprise. But the year has not been wholly barren. In various ways your Council has been using the time of waiting to consolidate the inner life of the Association, and to establish it on a firm basis for work in the future. There is no doubt that there has been a distinct quickening of the sense of unity in the district; ministers and churches have been drawn more closely together, and this unifying of interest must make for good in the future. No one can say what effect the war will have on the life of liberal religion in years to come; but, from practically all the churches in the district there come reports, not, indeed, of increasing numbers flocking to religious service, but of deepening religious feeling amongst those who do attend, intenser devotional life, and a new longing for a more vivid and vigorous personal, spiritual faith and fellowship. And this intensification of religious life, if not widespread, is inestimably valuable and significant. To those who feel its power, a free, simple Christian religion becomes more precious every day, whilst the number of those who need such a faith surely increases, and it is this fact which forms the ground of hope for our churches and their Association in the future."

In speeches filled with the fine traditional spirit of Liverpool laity, Mr. C. S. Jones and Mr. Harold Coventry proposed and seconded a resolution of deep sympathy with the labours of the ministers of the churches in the district, a resolution not confined, as in previous years, to ministers of "assisted churches," but extending to ministers of all the churches alike, all of whom belong to the District Association, and are equally engaged in its religious work. To this resolution the Rev. C. Roper, West Kirby, the Rev. G. Pegler, Crewe, and the Rev. W. Short, who wore the uniform of H.M.'s Army, replied. The Rev. J. C. Odgers, Rev. Harman Taylor, Rev. W. Jellie, and Mr. James Houghton of Gateacre, also took part in the meeting, which was felt by all to have been inspiring and helpful, and full of good omen for the future of the Association.

THE MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Midland Christian Union was held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Monday last. Mr. W. Byng Kenrick presided. Among those present were the Revs. Chas. Hargrove (President of the National Conference), Joseph Wood, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Lawrence Clare, and A. H. Shelley, Mr. Wm. Cheshire, Mr. Herbert New, and others.

Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, the retiring President, after occupying the position for fourteen years, moved the adoption of Report and financial statement. He remarked that at the beginning of last year he expressed the opinion that those left behind in certain occupations would experience a time of difficulty and trial, and their experience during the past year had confirmed that view. Gradually as the months had passed by to a greater extent they had felt the strain of little inconveniences jarring on a nervous system which, with nearly all of them, had been weakened by anxiety, and in some cases also deep grief. To a very large extent they were left without any specific rules or certain guides. What they did was largely the result of a compelling force, and also the result of individual effort. It was obvious the present was not a time when they should in any way relax, give up, or set on one side their own meetings and their own activities as specifically in connection with the religious side of their life. More than ever now they felt a need of religious consolation, and more than ever now they should meet from time to time to maintain those organisations which they had had handed on from the past for the support and assistance of religious effort. If they took their little group in the Midlands he was not dissatisfied with what had been done. There had been a certain progress. Those who knew the position of some congregations twelve years ago and knew them now, knew well there was distinct progress. He did not claim they had made great strides. Still, he did know there had been no stagnation. The body was there alive, waiting for any exceptional impulse which might come to it at any time. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, and carried unanimously.

The Rev. Dr. Hargrove, who moved that the best thanks be given to Mr. Kenrick for his services, eulogised his worth during the fourteen years he had been the President. He said it seemed to him that their President had set an example to the laity of what a layman might do for the Church and its ministers. He imagined that the number of years Mr. Kenrick had served in the office of President was a record without precedent.

The vote of thanks was unanimously carried, and Mr. Kenrick, suitably acknowledging the compliment, explained that other duties had been thrust upon him, and he had reached a time when he could not adequately perform all, but he should always look back upon the long period in which he held the Presidency with considerable joy and satisfaction. It had been a great education to him, and he had made many good friends.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who was unanimously elected as the new President, in accepting the position explained that one of the great encouragements he had in taking up the work was a sense that in the Midlands they had the kind of laity who worked with the ministers in the manner which they had already heard described.

Mr. Philip J. Worsley, Jun., was re-elected Treasurer, and Mr. E. Ellis Townley, Secretary.

At the close of the meeting an address was given by the Rev. B. H. Streeter, Canon of Hereford, on 'The Divinity of Christ in its Bearing on the Problem of Evil.' We do not attempt any summary of Canon Streeter's deeply interesting argument here, as we understand that the Address will appear in full in a volume of essays on the lines of 'Foundations.' This volume, which will be published by Messrs. Macmillan in about a month's time, will be called 'Concerning Prayer.'

The Rev. Lawrence Clare of the Church of the Messiah, proposing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, said in recent years they had been living in a fool's paradise. They had tried far too much to ignore the existence of evil.

Canon the Hon. J. G. Adderley, in seconding, said, though they might not say creeds together in the same form, they were united in the light which the Lord had thrown on the realities of life.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, supporting, said suffering was a thing which brought them near to the mystery of Divine love.

The preacher at the Service in the evening was the Rev. J. H. Weatherall of Essex Church, London.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

INVALID CHILDREN'S HOME.

The Twenty-Fifth Annual Meeting was held at the Home on Monday last, Mr. F. W. Turner presiding. A good attendance of friends took the opportunity offered of seeing the children and the ward-rooms, visits which seemed to give equal pleasure to both patients and visitors. The Report read by the Secretary, Mr. Ion Pritchard, told of the terrible anxiety caused one night in October last by a Zeppelin passing over the Home, and by the noise of the gun-firing all round; of the Nurse-Superintendent, Miss Phillips, being called away for military hospital duty, her place being taken by Miss M. Baker; of the general good health of the children in spite of a six months' visitation of mumps, the good health due to the open-air life, efficient nursing care and medical assistance.

The finance statement, presented by Mr. W. M. Blyth, showed that the year's expenditure had exceeded the receipts by £36, nearly absorbing the balance brought forward from 1914. The total outlay was £817, a little less than last year in spite of the increased cost of food, coals, and other things.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the reports, referred sympathetically to the nurses and their anxieties during the year of war, to the value of the work they were doing, and its success, as shown by the bright, happy faces of the children. He congratulated the Committee on the healthy condition of the finances, seeing that there was a balance of £3 on the right side and no overdraft of the bankers.

Mrs. Henry Herford, as representing the Holly Hill Guild, which is very substantially supporting the House, seconded the resolution. Mr. Pallister Young referred to the various sums received year by year from the four Hospital Funds, amounting in all to £135, and pointed out that these awards were proofs that the general management and finance of the Home were satisfactory and able to bear the searching examination to which they were put.

The resolution of thanks to the Medical Officers and staff was moved by Mrs. Wooding and seconded by Mrs. Blyth, both members of the Committee since the foundation of the Home. Mrs. Blyth mentioned from personal knowledge several cases of old patients now strong, healthy, and doing well. One of these, a cripple patient in 1902, is now a superintendent of a cripple boys' home in Blackheath.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberdeen.—At the Committee meeting of the Aberdeen Free Library, held on March 9, and presided over by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, Aberdeen University, an oil-painting by the Rev. Lucking Tavener was presented to the Public Library by Simon McLeod, Esq., and accepted with the thanks of the Committee. It was a picture painted three years ago by Mr. Tavener of Old Ruthrieston Bridge, by Deeside at Aberdeen. The bridge was built in 1663, and is the only example in the North of Scotland of the old pack-horse bridges, and shows on the side the painter has selected for his view some weather-worn and battered, but well-carved coats of arms. The picture gives a distant view of the Dee and the Old Bridge around which two Scottish battles were fought.

Birkenhead.—On Sunday morning, 12th inst., the Congregation of the Unitarian Church passed a vote of sympathy with Mr. James Samuelson on the great loss which he has sustained in the death of his wife. In moving the resolution, the Chairman, Mr. A. W. Willmer, spoke of Mrs. Samuelson's long connection with the church, of her very valuable help in everything connected with their congregational life, and of the affectionate remembrance in which Mrs. Samuelson was held by those who had been her friends and fellow worshippers.

Bolton: Unity Church.—The Annual Meeting of the members of the above Church was held on Wednesday, March 1, Mr. William Taylor in the chair. The report of the Committee on the year's work was read and approved and the Treasurer's accounts were passed. The proceedings were most harmonious and a spirit of optimism prevailed. At the annual Christmas Fair over £260 was raised, a splendid result considering the times. Over eighty scholars and members have enlisted in the army, three of them having been killed in France. During the year thirty-two new members were added to the membership roll. At the close of business the minister, the Rev. Edward Morgan, B.A., took the chair; and amid much enthusiasm the chairman asked Mr. Walter Makin to accept the gift of a roll-top desk as an acknowledgment of over twenty-three years of faithful service. The minister, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Joseph Lancaster spoke in feeling terms of the splendid work done by Mr. Makin. The latter fittingly responded. The tone of the whole meeting was one of high hope and augured well for the future of the cause.

Canada: Edmonton.—The Rev. C. F. Potter, B.A., B.D., Minister of the Unitarian Church in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, reports as follows: The war has been a severe test of all phases of Canadian life. It struck Western Canada at a time of financial depression, and the sudden tightening of the money market precipitated something of a commercial crisis. Edmonton has the record percentage of recruiting for all Canada, as over thirteen thousand men have enlisted here already, and the response is still good. All the churches of the city are hard hit. We have been able to hold our own, largely through the generous assistance to all the Western Canadian churches from the special fund authorised by the biennial Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches, and raised by the noble co-operation of the Unitarian churches of the United States. In spite of a very cold wave since the beginning of the year, the temperature reaching fifty below zero Fahrenheit, and lower in some districts, the interest at the church is good. Last Sunday, February 6, three new and valuable members were received into membership. The Board of Managers also authorised a movement for reaching the scattered Unitarians and Liberals in the small towns of the province. Lectures are delivered on Sunday afternoons on the north side of the river, and the results are gratifying. On January 9 Mr. Potter assisted Dr. Westwood of Winnipeg at the installation of the Rev. Wm. Irvine as minister of the Unitarian Church in Calgary.

London: Islington.—On Saturday afternoon, March 11, a well attended meeting was held, and the Rev. J. Vint Laughland was formally "welcomed" as minister of Unity Church, where he has been doing duty temporarily for some months. The chair was taken by Mr. Waters, in the absence of Mr. Alfred Wilson, who was kept away by a cold. After a hymn and prayer, led by the Rev. Basil Martin, Mr. F. L. Sargent, Secretary, read letters of apology and cordial good wishes from the Vicar, several local Congregational ministers, a Jewish Rabbi, Dr. W. Walsh of the Theistic Church, and Mrs. Bartram, one of the oldest supporters of the congregation. The Chairman explained that it had been considered wise to combine their social gathering with something of an "induction" service, and he expressed much satisfaction that so many London ministers had joined them on that important occasion. Mr. Laughland had, indeed, already won the esteem of the congregation, and they were hopefully looking forward to an extension of its life and influence under his ministry. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, as one of the ministers longest settled in London, heartily welcomed Mr. Laughland to their fraternity. He had brought high commendations from one well known and esteemed by some present, Prof. Hutcheon of Meadville, U.S.A., and they would now look to him to justify their confidence. If he himself were as young as Mr. Laughland and could use the experience he had gained in the years of his ministry, he would resolve more than ever to work, and work hard, alike for the pulpit and in pastoral duties. He would work to avoid giving his hearers hastily improvised materials on the one hand, and things too hard for average hearers on the other. He would try his best to be a friend with all, old and young, in the congregation; and he would strictly avoid debt, that snare which had, to his knowledge, ruined several promising careers. The illustrious ministerial line of their church looked to him to be a worthy successor, and all would wish him the truest success. The Rev. H. Gow, speaking especially on the duties of the congregation, summed them up in the word "loyalty"—not to the minister merely, nor to the Church merely; but to that which was above both—loyalty to great ideals, to worship, to God. In these days, loyalty to their country, and to the liberty and right for which they believed their country to stand, was the surest protection against the miserable temptation to find fault with the nation s leaders. So a congregation, imbued with loyalty to the highest, would gladly co-operate with their minister. "Unity," the name of the church, should be a good omen for their future. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie also testified to the excellent reputation Mr. Laughland bore to this country from the United States. These were times to test any man's faith and courage, especially a minister's; let the congregation support him with their earnest sympathy and appreciation while he sought to strengthen their hearts. Mrs. S. Titford added a few words of gracious welcome to the new minister and his wife, and pledged the congregation to do its best for their happiness and prosperity in all their work. In reply, the Rev. J. Vint Laughland expressed his grateful appreciation of the kindly counsel and welcome he had received. He trusted that all this, added to the goodwill and assistance he had already received in his new sphere, would stimulate him to be their true helper in every way. He realised how much he needed such support, and he thanked those who had in any way helped his work thus far, by suggestion and co-operation. He hoped they would take him as a sincere man, doing his best; they could not fail then to get on well together, and do something for the district as well as for the congregation. Mrs. Laughland also spoke, and warmly invited the young people to share fully in their Church's life. After another hymn, the benediction was said by the Rev. F. Summers, and the meeting ended.

London Sunday School Society.—The annual meeting of the London Sunday School Society was held on Wednesday evening, March 15, at Essex Hall, the President, the Rev. A. H. Biggs, in the chair. The Report, which was read by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. A. Stephen Noel, showed that in spite of the paralysing influence of the war upon the work of the Sunday Schools, the Society had continued a large proportion of its activities, though some meetings had been abandoned, and it had been impossible to initiate new work or to enlarge the scope of its influence. The system of promiscuous visitations at schools has been temporarily discontinued, but it is hoped that when the opportunity arises, and the right individual is available, a series of correlated visits may be arranged by an authorised representative of the Society who could report upon, and assist in, the management and teaching in the schools. The general expenditure, and also the adverse balance at the beginning of the year, had been almost exactly met by income, largely owing to the curtailment of expenses and to the appeal issued to schools to help in reducing the deficit. Grants had been made by the Country Holiday Fund to several schools amounting to £93 9*s.* 3*d.*, and there is a balance of £28 0*s.* 4*d.* to be carried forward, which is not too large a sum in view of the uncertainty surrounding next year's efforts. The war has necessarily affected the fortunes of the holiday home, Bernard House, at Southend, and in spite of the excellent management of Miss Angles, the Lady Superintendent, whose services are very greatly appreciated, the Society is faced with the possibility of closing the Home, and putting an end to its useful work, unless teachers, scholars, and friends will take more advantage of the opportunities which it offers of promoting bodily health and rest of mind among sympathetic friends by the sea. The position is serious, as the legacies from which adverse balances have been met in previous years are nearly exhausted, and a deficit which it will be difficult to meet is anticipated at the end of the present year. Mr. Asquith Wooding, the Treasurer, expressed his opinion later on that the difficulty might be solved if each of the twenty-five Sunday schools belonging to the Society would guarantee £1, to be raised in any way they think best. It is not a large sum, and it ought not to be difficult to obtain it if the teachers really value the benefits of the Home, and wish them to be available in the time to come. Mr. Biggs, in moving the adoption of the Report, emphasised the importance of keeping their activities going, as far as possible, as in pre-war times. Children felt, more acutely than adults, the loss of interests in their life to which they had become accustomed, and it was specially important at a time like the present, when a certain unhealthy excitability and restlessness of mind is observable among the young people, that the teachers should preserve their influence over them, visiting them as usual in their homes, and setting the example of calmness, cheerfulness, and serenity which is so sorely needed. The Treasurer, Mr. Asquith Wooding, gave a statement of accounts, making a special plea for the Southend Holiday Home, and seconded the adoption of the Report. Mr. Ion Pritchard and the Rev. F. Summers. supported, and the Report was adopted The election of the officers was moved by the Rev. H. Dawtrey. The President was re-elected for another year, and three new members have been added to the Committee—Miss Hilda Hargrove, Miss Mary Francis, and Miss May Withall. An admirable address on 'Adolescence,' which evoked some discussion, was delivered by Mr. Noel. He dealt with the subject from a psychological aspect, tracing the growth of the child till he arrives at that stage of instability—that mental and spiritual renascence—which constitutes the turning point of his life, and is fraught with so many dangers if he is subjected to the wrong influences at this period. It would be especially helpful to teachers and parents if such an address could be delivered in every Sunday school. The five points to be remembered in connection with the training of adolescents are, Mr. Noel pointed out: (1) the necessity of normal submission to culture, in the widest sense, and environment; (2) the undesirability of any harshness in dealing with eccentricities and variations, which are to be expected and dealt with sympathetically; (3) the importance of a variety in outlook; (4) personal influence, and the guidance of sympathetic and well-trained minds; (5) the study of individual character in the most patient, generous and tactful spirit.

Northampton.—The annual social gathering of the members of Kettering Road Church was held on Thursday, March 9. With the military in occupation of part of the buildings, limitations had to be observed, and all proceedings took place in the lower schoolroom. After tea, Mr. T. W. Lea rose on behalf of the members of the Church to present to the Rev. W. C. Hall a wallet containing a substantial sum in Treasury Notes as a mark of their appreciation and affection. He was followed by Mrs. James Jackson and Mr. John Sale. Mr. Hall, who was completely taken by surprise, in acknowledging the gift, spoke of the happiness he had found in the congregation and of his great hope for the future of the Church, the assurance of which had been given in the reports recently presented at the annual meeting. A programme of music by several of the most talented performers in the town, and of humorous sketches by members of the Garrick Dramatic Society, was then rendered under the general direction of Mr. J. Pagesmith. The Church Anniversary Services were held last Sunday, when Mr. Hall preached on 'The Permanence of the Church' and 'Principles of Our Churchmanship.'

Southport: The late Dr. D. A. Wormald.—The Southport Church and the cause for which all our churches stand have sustained a great loss in the death of Dr. Wormald. A generation of visitors will remember his regularity as Churchwarden. His fellow members will miss his solid and faithful support. Before taking up residence in Southport he had built up a business as dentist in Bury; and here, too, he was zealous and hardworking for the welfare of the church. He was always an ardent politician, was an acceptable speaker, and held many prominent offices in the political circles of the places where he resided. For ten years he was a Justice of the Peace; and many of his colleagues on the Bench, as well as political associates and friends of the church, gave token of their respect by attending the public service which preceded his funeral on Friday last.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

Carmen Sylva's Death.

Queen Elizabeth of Roumania was known to most people as a talented authoress with poetic gifts which had received wide recognition; but in her own country she was even better known for her untiring devotion to the welfare of her people, and the whole-hearted support which she gave to every good and charitable cause. She took a special interest in peasant industries, and sought to preserve the picturesque national costume, which she habitually wore during her summer residence in the picturesque Schloss Pelesch among the Carpathians. "Carmen Sylva" has herself described how she was first attracted to her future husband by his desire to make his people happy, when she met him at Cologne during a Beethoven festival, not knowing he was a suitor for her hand, and heard his plans for the future. "He told me," she said, "about his difficult task, and about the exotic country which had become his own, its wide plains and savage mountains, its white-clad peasantry, frugal, grave, and endowed with weird powers of untaught eloquence and poetry. He spoke long and well, while I listened breathlessly, rapt in astonishment and delight. He described the great masters of the land, those boyards, cultivated yet barbarous in mind and customs, whose souls were alive with the blended charm of the Byzantine influence and the hot blood of old Latin descent. I envied the young sovereign who had taken up a sceptre whose maintenance required as firm a grasp as a sword, and I said to him openly, 'You are a happy man!'"

Sensational Posters.

Canon Rawnsley has uttered a timely protest against the demoralising influence of the sensational posters which adorn the walls of cheap picture palaces, and we could wish that some censorship might be exercised in regard to these "blood and thunder" pictures. Not only are they vulgar and flagrantly inartistic, but they have the effect of strong stimulants on minds ill prepared to resist their hypnotic appeal, and, in the end, like all strong stimulants, they deaden sensibility, and induce callousness and indifference to scenes or tales of horror. The ideas which these pictures conjure up, the "brutal use of force, desperate crime, the armed burglar, as large as life, with his handkerchief masking his face, about to fire his pistol, the horse-thief hanged, the murderer standing over his victim—all this kind of thing," says Canon Rawnsley, "is a liberal education in the worst of schools for those who frequent our public thoroughfares. Let the Government tax these abominations by the inch and they will cease to exist."

Household Economy.

The President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries (Lord Selborne), writing to the Hon. Secretary of The National Food Reform Association, says: "I have read with interest the last series (third) of your booklets, 'Facts for Patriots.' I wish your Association every success in its campaign of instruction, which I trust may result in increased household economy."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE have referred several times in these Notes to the fine rally of the Belgian Army after its heroic resistance in the first weeks of the war. We have done so out of personal knowledge, though necessarily with the vagueness and reticence imposed upon us by military conditions. Some people have expressed unqualified surprise at what we have told them, and have even hinted, of course with all politeness, that we may have allowed our sympathy with the sufferings of Belgium and our absorption in the work which we are doing to help her, to betray us into some pardonable exaggeration. The striking article by Lord Northcliffe, which was published in The Times on Wednesday, more than confirms all that we have said. It gives the English public the assurance that the Belgian Army is still taking a very important and dangerous part in the war, and is doing so with splendid dash and courage in spite of the terrible conditions to which it is exposed.

OF course we have had a quite definite object in view in all that we have written on this subject. It has been not merely to impart information, but to quicken sympathy. We want all the help which we are able to send to be a tribute of glowing admiration, not a concession to pity. We know well that the gladness of helping is more than doubled when we help those who know how to help themselves. And this is what we are doing. The Hut for rest and recreation which we are going to erect at Calais, and all the gifts which we send into the Belgian Military Hospitals and Convalescent Depôts are for men who are bearing themselves bravely and have endured inconceivable suffering of body and mind in the defence of their country. It is an epic of courage which has enriched the noblest records of the world, and no tribute we offer can ever be worthy of it.

SIR EDWARD GREY made a statement in the House of Commons on Tuesday which will meet with the strong approval of all the friends of Belgium. Great Britain, France, and Russia, after previously informing their Allies, have made the following declaration to the Belgian Government: "The Allied and Guaranteeing Powers declare that, when the time comes, the Belgian Government will be invited to participate in the peace negotiations, and that they will not cease hostilities unless Belgium is reinstated in her political and economic independence, and largely indemnified for the wrongs she has suffered. They will lend their aid to Belgium to secure her commercial and financial recovery."

THE visit of Mr. Hughes, the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth of Australia is most welcome and opportune. Not only is he a man of the strong fibre of which empire-builders are made, he is an excellent speaker, with keen popular sympathies and political vision. The romance of his life has been brought home to the public mind by his visit last Tuesday to the Burdett-Coutts Schools, Westminster, where he was formerly a scholar and pupil teacher. In the speech which he made to the children, with its pleasant memory of Matthew Arnold as an examiner, he went straight home to essential things when he told them that the thing to learn at school was not to win prizes but to live a simple, honest, straightforward life, telling as few lies as possible, and no lies at all that were mean or petty. Many a new colonial must have been created by his description of the days when he used to go down to the East India Docks to see the ships that went to Australia until he could resist the lure of the new land no longer. "Find out what it is that you want in life," he said in conclusion, "—that is what education is for—and so order your whole life as to attain it. Tenacity of purpose is the keynote of success. When you get home hold on with all your soul and strength. That is the characteristic of the British everywhere."

BUT, of course, the chief significance of Mr. Hughes's visit is in connection with the problems which are looming ahead. We are concerned not simply with the future of Europe. We have to consider with all the strength of thought and imagination which we can bring to bear upon the problem, the future of the British Empire and its relation to the world. There is danger in some quarters lest our possible terms of peace should be discussed almost exclusively from the point of view of Belgium, and the invaded provinces of France and the racial tangle in the Balkans. The Colonial problem cannot be ignored. The Overseas Dominions will have much to say about what they consider equitable and safe for themselves. They and the Mother-country must draw much closer together, and they must be protected as they have not been before against the terrible menace of German intrigue.

The war in other words must transform us all into men of Imperial vision. Some of us still shy at the word, because it has a flavour of force and military domination. But there is such a thing as an Empire of justice and goodwill as well as an Empire in arms, and we can use the term in the nobler sense as we speak sometimes of the Empire of the Spirit, and in doing so we are in strict agreement with the facts. This was the thought underlying the noble speech by the Rev. William Temple at the "Fight for Right" meeting in the Queen's Hall on Tuesday. Germany, he said, was under the delusion that we were holding our dominions very loosely, and that if she gave us a rough shaking they would fall away. But we found, when the war began, that instead of our holding them, they were holding on to us. The British Empire, unlike those of ancient times, was really a Commonwealth of free nations, holding together because that was what they wanted to do. It was a foreshadowing of what might come to pass over the whole world, and then war need be no more.

This point of view is as just as it is magnificent, and it must have a controlling influence upon all our political thinking for the future. We want to guard the Empire, not because it ministers to our pride to feel that we belong to it, but for the plain and sufficient reason that in spite of all our blunders and crimes—and some of us unfortunately always put these things in the foreground of the picture—it is the noblest and most beneficent experiment in civilisation in the history of the world. May we add the reflection that it is as true of religion as it is of statecraft that our vision must go beyond the parish boundaries. The Church that is going to live in the more spacious days that are coming must be conscious of its imperial mission and send forth its preachers to the ends of the earth.

We share wholeheartedly in the rejoicings in India at the announcement of the Viceroy that the discredited system of Indian indentured labour in the tropics is to be abolished. There has been a strong and growing feeling of resentment against the system for many years. Lord Hardinge spoke of his own dislike of it. "No one," he said, "who knows anything of Indian sentiment can remain ignorant of the deep and genuine disgust to which the continuance of the indenture system has given rise." It is, of course, true that many improvements and restrictions have been introduced in the interest of the coolies. During his Viceroyalty Lord Hardinge himself has prohibited the recruiting of indentured Indian labour for Natal. But the system itself is bad, and the only way to improve it is to sweep it away altogether.

Prof. J. H. Morgan's report of his official investigation into "German Atrocities" on the field of battle and in the devastated districts in France has just been issued by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. It is not a book for the general reader. but it must be read by serious students of the war and its problems. We cannot ignore the horrible things which it contains in any just estimate of the situation or dismiss them as impossible because they are blacker than we care to believe. We fear that some people are inclined to do this, and in consequence, to be more hopeful about the rapid healing of our moral wounds than the facts warrant. This is a matter upon which Prof. Morgan has no illusions. He sees no possibility of the restoration of any comity of nations based upon international law unless there is a general agreement to treat Germany as an outlaw until her public morality has been radically transformed.

We publish to-day a letter from the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed in which he takes us to task for our comments last week upon M. Rolland's striking book, 'Above the Battle.' Our readers will welcome another point of view, as we certainly do ourselves. But we fear that we are unrepentant. There is a good deal in M. Rolland's pages that seems to us to belong to the vague international idealism, which was common to many literary men in the days before the war, and it has not been corrected and enlarged by the sharp discipline of facts. The ideal of a Western European civilisation with firm barriers against Russia, and holding itself proudly aloof from Oriental barbarians, has disappeared; and for ourselves we believe that something much bigger and finer will come in its place. We understand, too, how his attitude of a preceptor of virtue must be a little irritating to his countrymen. He is in such constant fear of what Dr. Wicksteed calls "our own lowered ideals and materialised aims" that it seems to us fair to describe his attitude as one of imperfect sympathy. And to ourselves—we confess it quite frankly—imperfect sympathies at the present moment are not only deeply disappointing; they are morally false.

The congregation of Essex Church, Kensington, is engaged at present in a publicity campaign, the result of which will be watched with deep interest by other churches. The aim of the movement is expressed in the following words which have been widely circulated:—"The searchings of heart caused by the War impose upon us the duty of making our Church, its services and its message, known to a wider public. Believing that nothing but a Revived Faith, in God and the Human Soul, in the supremacy of Righteousness, and in the Redeeming Power of Love, can make the present endurable or the future hopeful, we feel urgently moved to share this faith with others."

The methods adopted are not of the haphazard or amateur kind with which we are familiar. They are under the control of an expert adviser, who has had wide and successful experience in the art of making things known. His point of view is that the public must be made to want the Church and its services, because they are good and desirable, and this can only be done by exactly the right kind of advertising. The campaign has been started at the right moment. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall is now firmly in the saddle; he has had time to take stock of the strength and weakness of the position; but he is still a new voice. Moreover, the congregation is on the up grade, and full of a feeling of encouragement which will be attractive to strangers. We are aware of the dangers of a passion for advertising in religious work. But a minister may become well known without losing his modesty, just as a church may be crowded without lowering the tone of its services. In any case, no one who knows Mr. Weatherall will have any doubt that in his hands those higher interests are quite secure.

STOPFORD A. BROOKE, 1832-1916.

It is impossible for any one who knew Mr. Stopford Brooke personally to associate his passing from us with thoughts of gloom. The trappings and the pageantry of death may adorn the poor dust of worldly state, but they have no fitness for the prophet of love and joy. As we remember him there is one word that comes to our lips. It is radiance. His was a radiant life, sensitive to every appeal of beauty, and radiating his own joyousness to men and women to whom he became a revealer of things lovely and of good report. This was the secret of his personal charm as a companion and of the power of his sermons. He did not criticise or explain, or solve the stubborn problems of the mind. He saw and he made others see. He heard and he made others hear. He opened our blind eyes to heavenly visions and filled our dull ears with the music of the world.

The men who were young in the '80's, full of the zest of life and the passion of reform, owed much to him. He played upon our moods and gave us confidence in our ventures. His books were to us the gateway into a splendid world. How many of us marked with a white stone the day when we first read the 'Life of Robertson of Brighton,' and felt in its noble pages what a great biography can be as a revelation of the secrets of the heart and a summons to exacting duty. Or it was 'Theology in the English Poets' which went with us on a holiday, to be devoured as we lay stretched at full length upon the grass beneath a summer sky, while the spell worked and shining through the veils of nature's loveliness we felt the immanent presence of God. Even more memorable were the hours which we spent in the uncomfortable pews in Bedford Chapel while we listened to a preacher who could banish all languor and wandering of mind. To the present writer two occasions come back with unusual clearness. One was the first Sunday evening after Mr. Brooke's secession from the Church of England. He explained some of the reasons which had led him to take this momentous step; but the impression left upon one young mind was not chiefly that of admiration for his arguments, though no doubt there was an element of eager intellectual assent. It was one of compelling wonder at his gladness of heart. He had given up a fine position and the certain prospect of further honours for conscience sake, and there was not a trace of self-pity or the sorrow of sacrifice. The other occasion was an ordinary Sunday. He was preaching on the cloud of witnesses, and then at the end he bade us lift up our eyes and behold the mighty army of the saints inspiring, kindling, consoling us as we run our race. Suddenly the dingy chapel was transfigured into the courts of heaven. We saw these heavenly presences with their eyes intent upon us. We felt the rapture of their fellowship. "All around us they sit, in the vast amphitheatre of the spiritual world, tier on tier of watching figures, pitying and applauding, solemn, beautiful faces, shining with the light of discovered truth and accomplished love, and in infinite peace—our brothers and sisters of whose divine assemblage we shall one day form a part." It was wonderful word-painting, worthy of a great artist. But it was something more. It was his own vision made visible to us.

It is easy to describe Mr. Brooke as an artist in emotion, not without a tone of disparagement if our own taste is for intellectual severity or a more logical order of mind. But it is not in this grudging mood that wise men accept the bounties of heaven. He interpreted everything he touched, poetry, social life, or religion, through his own temperament. But it was a temperament so finely sensitive that it reflected multitudinous impressions which escape the common eye. No doubt he owed much of the strength and fire of his emotional life to his Irish ancestry, but the spark of genius was all his own; and it has been a service of inestimable value to the higher life of our country that while others were absorbed in the limited aims of artistic coteries or drifted into the worship of pagan ideals, he gave himself with ardour to the spiritual interpretation of the noblest works of man, and reached the summit of his powers as a revealer of the beauty of holiness.

For it was not only in the presence of the pictures of Turner and the poetry of Shelley and Wordsworth that the enchantments of beauty awoke in his heart. The New Testament, and above all, the picture of Jesus in the Gospels, shone for him with light and colour, and gave harmony and peace to the rich and vivid play of his emotional life. This spirit of joyousness, drawing its nutriment from childlike simplicity and the adoration of love, was something different from the calm that succeeds to long struggle; it was more spontaneous and instinctive. There was in it an element of quiet brooding and wise passiveness. But he had in him also the qualities of the soldier. He sprang from a fighting race. He vibrated to the martial qualities of the Christian soul, its courage, its chivalry, and its zest for the battle. His joy was not simply the peace of tranquil days, which were rich in good; it was also the rapture of achievement. He came into the world nobly dowered, trailing the clouds of glory which tell of heavenly birth. He lived among us as one of the sons of light, and for him the vision splendid lost none of its radiance through all the length of days.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Of innocence, and love, and trust,
Of quiet work, and simple word,
Of joy, and thoughtlessness of self,
Build up my life, good Lord.

All happy thoughts, and gentle ways,
And loving-kindness daily given,
And freedom through obedience gained,
Make in my heart thine Heaven.

And all the wisdom that is born
Of joy and love that question not,
The child's bright vision of the earth,
Be mine, O Lord, unsought.

O happy thus to live and move!
And sweet this world, where I shall find God's beauty everywhere, his love
His good in all mankind.

Then, Father, grant this childlike heart,
That I may come to Christ, and feel
His hands on me in blessing laid,
Love giving, strong to heal.

So when, far fled from earth, I come
Before thee, happy and forgiven,
The heavenly host may cry with joy,
"A child is born in heaven."

Stopford A. Brooke.

THE SYMPATHY OF HEAVEN WITH EARTH.

We feel ourselves part of the mighty army of the saints who have conquered and are now at rest. Not only the Church of the present is with us, but the innumerable assembly of the just made perfect in the past. Inspiring, kindling, consoling, cheering, sympathising voices are in our ears. "Well done," we hear, "good and faithful servant." All around us they sit, in the vast amphitheatre of the spiritual world, tier on tier of watching figures, pitying and applauding; solemn, beautiful faces, shining with the light of discovered truth and accomplished love, and in infinite peace—our brothers and sisters of whose divine assemblage we shall one day form a part; and among them, in highest place, with that unutterable love upon His countenance which drew all humanity, in whose soft ardours all the others shine, to whom all turn with reverence their look, to whom we now look with eager longing, awe and love—Jesus, the beginner and perfecter of our faith, the leader of the humanity in whose cause He died, who ran the race we run, who found His goal in the Father in whom we too shall find our rest. This is the inspiring vision that we see, and nothing in the whole universe can excel its majesty but the reality of the vision itself.

Stopford A. Brooke.

O LORD and heavenly Father, we thy humble servants entirely desire thy fatherly goodness mercifully to accept this our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; most humbly beseeching thee to grant, that we and all thy whole Church both in heaven and earth, may be gathered together in one communion in Christ Jesus. And here we offer and present unto thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and bodies, to be a reasonable, holy and lively sacrifice unto thee, humbly beseeching thee so to fulfil us with thy grace and heavenly benediction, that we may continue in that holy fellowship, and daily be renewed by thy Spirit unto the eternal kingdom which thou hast promised us by Jesus Christ. Amen.

ANOTHER VISIT TO FRANCE.

AMONG THE REFUGEE CHILDREN FROM THE YSER DISTRICT.

I arrived in France this time via Le Havre, and went on deck as we came alongside the quay about middle day to find it snowing hard and bitterly cold. A bad crossing made me reluctant to do anything that day but make arrangements for the next. It was arranged that we should visit some of the Colonies Scolaires Belges the next day and inspect the house which it was proposed to convert into a children's hospital at Yvetôt. These "Colonies" have been founded by M. Berryer, the Minister of the Interior, who rightly feels that the future generation is immensely important to Belgium. As he said to me, "If these little people have two years here, and during that time are well nourished, well cared for, taught good habits, and well educated—well, that is something good which has come out of this terrible time." He is most ably assisted in this work by Madame Carton de Wiart, who returned to her family last December from her five months' imprisonment in Germany.

The next morning after I arrived, Madame Carton de Wiart called for us at 10 o'clock in an auto, and we started off through the slushy roads for Barentin. As soon as we left the town behind, it was glorious, as the snow lay thickly everywhere and the trees were loaded, as there was not a breath of wind to shake it down, and the sun was shining brightly. After about one and three quarter hours we reached the Château de Malaise, near Barentin, a fine house in a beautiful park of several acres. We arrived just as all the children were assembled in the corridor for their midday meal—a bowl of soup and potatoes. The youngest was 2½ years and the eldest about 13. Most of them were quite little ones. The nuns have a great deal to do as most of the children are too small to do much for themselves. The elder girls help in the housework, and before we left we saw them washing up the dinner things and cleaning down the tables. The beds were all very clean and neat—there is practically no furniture except the beds, basins to wash in, and tables and forms for meals. There is a building in the garden which is used as a schoolhouse, where we saw classes. The very little ones were playing round singing games in one room under the care of a sister. The bigger girls learn sewing and do the mending for the house in the afternoon. As the snow was thick on the ground, and the children had only one pair of very poor boots each and no slippers, they cannot play out of doors in wet weather. They are giving them sabots to wear now, but they need soft cloth boots or shoes to wear inside the sabots, otherwise they are too cold for this weather.

We went on from there to Saussay, where there are only girls—102 were there—ages about 8 or 9 up to 16. The Minister of the Interior quite rightly does not care to let these older girls go out to service in France, but thinks it safer to keep them under care, and gradually there will be a certain number placed in all the schools to help the sisters, who are certainly, at present, rather overworked. The sisters here were dressed in white, and were all highly educated women. Fifty of the girls sleep in a wooden hut erected in the garden, and on asking them which they preferred, the hut or the house, they all voted for the hut for sleeping in. Here they are educating the girls well, teaching Flemish to the French speaking, and French to the Flemish, and it is proposed to teach lace making and machine knitting and embroidery; but the school has only been open a short time, and there has not yet been time to organise this. The building is a beautiful château, and the view over the park, covered with snow, was enchanting. However, it was snowing so hard by this time that we did not dare wait long as we had still a long way to go. Our next call was at Yvetôt, where we went at once to the prefecture to see the wife of the sous préfet for Yvetôt. She has been most energetic in finding houses for the schools, and had now found a suitable house for the proposed hospital.

There are twenty-two of these Colonies Scolaires Belges in the district and no hospital. Accidents will happen—a child breaks an arm for instance. The visiting doctor will set it, but it is impossible in a school where the sisters are so fully engaged to look after a helpless child. Or perhaps an operation for appendicitis has to be performed. If so the child will at once go to the nearest French civil hospital; but all the hospitals are used for soldiers, and it is most difficult to give up a bed for a long illness. Again, if there is a suspect case of measles, whooping cough, &c., there is no provision for it in these very roughly furnished schools, and a place where infectious cases can be taken and isolated is most needed. The house proposed stands in a large garden, and has a meadow behind on which it would be possible to erect a large hut if the number of schools greatly increased. In the house there is room for about 25 beds, and 4 beds for three nurses and a servant, also a room for the doctor where all the medicines and instruments, &c., can be kept. There is a washhouse and kitchen, both quite good, and a large attic for keeping clothes and a few reserve beds for emergencies. There is a good water supply, and gas is laid on. I think a very satisfactory little hospital can be made here, and its need is very clear. Each head of a school expressed a hope that it would be started, and started as soon as possible.

In discussing the matter after with M. Berryer, it was suggested that the hospital should be called after me, and it was arranged accordingly. The beds are already on their way, but there is a good deal of equipment needed. This will go as soon as it is ready, but it has to be paid for! A fortnight later I visited two other "Colonies." At one of them the beds were very bad indeed, and I was thankful to think 50 cots were on their way out for the "tinies" (a gift we were enabled to send through the kindness of the Rev. Thos. Phillips of the Baptist Central Church, Bloomsbury). They arrived a few days after our visit, and are now in use. At the other there were 55 little ones, boys and girls, aged 3 to 9 years. The problem the sister in charge was worrying out at the moment was how to make thoroughly worn-out stockings last a little longer. It seemed insoluble until our appearance raised hopes of a possible solution. I went into the room where they were all eating a hearty supper of hot milk and slices of home-made bread. The chaplain in charge was evidently a child-lover, and beloved by the children. They were very interested in me, and asked questions about me in Flemish, and wanted to tell me about their doings. So we tried to talk, but I could not understand their Flemish, and they could not understand my English, so I asked the names of things, and they taught me some words with huge delight. One little one was fretting with toothache, but the chaplain leant over her, and pretended to rub her cheek with his cigarette end, saying it would make it well, and in a few moments the child was all smiles again, and said that her toothache had quite gone. All the others shouted with laughter as they had seen the manœuvre with the cigarette end! There was a charming feeling of home about the place, and I felt that these children were living in an atmosphere of love, and receiving real parental care from the chaplain and sisters. Where a spirit such as this reigns our material help will, we may be sure, be used to the fullest advantage.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—You ask why Romain Rolland's book is "so disappointing," and (as I understand) you find the answer in his supposed lack of a "sense of the gladness and the glory of sacrifice." But the work you thus criticise contains, amongst many other kindred utterances, the following words addressed to the French soldiers in the trenches:—

"O, my friends, may nothing mar your joy! Whatever fate has in store, you have risen to the pinnacle of earthly life, and borne your country with you. And you will be victorious. Your self-sacrifice, your courage, your whole-hearted faith in your sacred cause, and your unshaken certainty that you are defending the liberty of the world—all this assures me of your victory, young armies of the Marne and Meuse, whose names are graven henceforth in history by the side of your elders of the great Republic. Yet even had misfortune decreed that you should be vanquished, and with you France itself, no people could have aspired to a more noble death....Conquerors or conquered, living or dead, rejoice! As one of you said to me, embracing me on the terrible threshold: 'A splendid thing it is to fight with clean hands and a pure heart, and to dispense divine justice with one's life.'"

You seem to reproach the author for giving us "musings from a lonely watch-tower" at a time when we ought all "to do our duty in the world as it is"; but is it possible that you address these reproaches to the man who has been giving his whole heart to organising agencies for exchange of prisoners, for finding means of communication between interned or captive aliens, in every country, and their friends at home, and for developing the sense of friendliness of victors, of every nationality, towards those of their "enemies" who can no longer hurt them, and are now absolutely dependent on their generosity? Have the men who repatriated a badly wounded German soldier, and read on his postcard of acknowledgment his tribute of gratitude to "gutes Frankreich" performed no duty to "the world as it is," and are they doing nothing for the world as it shall be?

In conclusion, may I try to explain why some of us find Rolland's book the most inspiring thing that the war literature has thrown in our way? It is because, while every page of it seems to us to burn with the conviction of the righteousness of the cause of the Allies, it shows us as no other book has done its hopefulness. For I take for granted that "the cause of the Allies" is embodied not in the evil thought—impossible of realisation—of "crushing Germany"; but in the hope of converting the heart of Europe from ideals of domination and oppression to ideals of freedom and fellowship, and Rolland has shown us as no other has—and not by any "poisoned sweetness" of dreams, but by palpable and abundant evidence—that there is a slowly deepening sense for this better ideal in the mind of the younger Germany, and this is especially manifested in letters from the trenches. This gives us hope that the only victory worth gaining is, indeed, possible of achievement; but it also teaches us how essential a part of the fight must be against our own lowered ideals and materialised aims.—Yours, &c.

Philip H. Wicksteed.

Childrey, near Wantage.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Last week I read several reviews of Romain Rolland's 'Au-dessus de la mêlée,' and was grieved by the impression all gave of a certain priggish detachment, though the article in The Inquirer did full justice to the beauty of much of the book. Now the reviews, when the book first appeared, were so different, so enthusiastic, that it occurs to me to wonder whether the translation just published (which, presumably, has led to the present reviews) can be at all in fault. I have not seen it, and the extracts given seem to be excellent, yet it is possible that even a single word may fail to give the exact meaning. Then again, it is only fair to remember that M. Rolland wrote these articles last year, some, I think, even in 1914, and possibly to-day would have put some things a little differently. The attitude of all of us has altered, however insensibly, as the weary months have passed. Few of us, alas! have been able to retain the first almost joyous feeling of ennoblement in the taking part in this crusade against an evil thing. We may as fully believe it to be a crusade, but not only has the physical strain of anxiety told on us, but the bickerings of politicians and general air of criticism have dragged us down.

When, some months ago, my husband and I read the book we felt it the most comforting and uplifting thing we had read since those beautiful articles of Clutton Brock in the early days of the war. Anything which brings the eternal verities home to us, and enables us to think that the present, with its inexpressible horrors, is a passing phase in the world's history, is a thing to be so grateful for that I am sorry to think that some may be deprived of this comfort. The reviews might lead readers to fear that they would find in its pages something of the tone which, to most of us, has been so extremely trying, of certain among the pacifists who excuse what to us appears the pure devilry of the enemy by the wants they profess to see in our diplomacy. The tone used in discussions to-day as to cutting out German trade (which may or may not be a wise proceeding), amounting in some cases to "Won't we kick him when we have got him down," makes me wish that M. Rolland's words to Hauptmann, that he will not demean his soul by hating, may be as widely read as possible for our own sake.—Yours, &c.

[We must hasten to exonerate the translator. The aloofness to which we alluded springs no doubt from the fact that M. Rolland is a Frenchman, living not in Paris but in Switzerland. This may account for the fact that in some passages he seems more at home in the tepid zone of neutrality than close to the burning heart of his own country.—Ed. of Inq.].

THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—I have been much distressed and disgusted on reading the way in which conscientious objectors are treated by the Tribunals. Our forefathers stood up for liberty of thought, speech, and action, and struggled and suffered long to obtain it. And Mr. Asquith promised that the conscientious objector should have full consideration shown him by the tribunals. But the tribunals seem, in many cases, to disregard this promise, and refuse exemptions in an arbitrary manner, trying to entrap the applicant into some damaging admission. It is not fair to ask a man what he would do if his mother or sister were in danger from a German soldier. Probably he does not know; for such a case (thank God!) has never yet occurred in England, and we trust it never will. In such dire extremity he would probably act on the impulse of the moment; and I do not think his conscience would blame him if he did what, in ordinary circumstances, he would shrink from in horror. But that is not the question now. It is a very different question whether it is right for him to go and be trained in the art of killing. Neither is it fair to ask him whether he is a Quaker. Conscience is individual, not collective. A man has a right to a conscience, and may agree with the Quakers as to war and non-resistance without adopting their modes of speech and of worship.—Yours, &c. M. C. Martineau.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

Mr. Stopford Brooke died peacefully after a very short illness in his country home, The Four Winds, Ewhurst, Surrey, last Saturday, March 18. He was born in 1832 at Letterkenny, co. Donegal, and throughout his life preserved not only the characteristics of an Irishman, but also a passionate devotion to the land of his birth. After graduating at Trinity College, Dublin, he was ordained in 1857, and after holding two curacies in London he was appointed chaplain to the Embassy in Berlin, 1863–65. On his return to England he began his notable ministry at St. James's Chapel, York Street, 1866–75, and during this period was appointed Hon. Chaplain to the Queen. In 1876 his ministry was transferred to Bedford Chapel, where he remained till his retirement in 1894. But meanwhile a momentous change had taken place in his ecclesiastical position by his secession from the Church of England in 1880. It was a bold step taken in loyalty to conscience, and possibly with the hope that others in the small but notable band of Broad Churchmen would follow his example; but nothing happened. Some necessary changes were made in the service, which still conformed to the Anglican model, and he continued to preach in the same building to the same congregation, thinned a little by a few resignations of membership. For four years, 1897–1901, he travelled about the country as special preacher at the invitation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and during 1902–4 he preached frequently at Little Portland Street Chapel. In recent years he has often spoken with all the old beauty and force from the pulpit of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead. His last book, a volume of sermons called 'The Onward Cry,' issued in 1911, was dedicated to the Rev. Henry Gow, in gracious memory of these Sunday evenings.

But Mr. Brooke was even more widely known as a literary man than as a preacher. His first book, 'The Life and Letters of the late Frederick W. Robertson,' published in 1865, is also one of his best, and has taken its place in the small group of great biographies. With 'Theology in the English Poets' in 1874 he began the long series of studies of English poetry, always illuminated with spiritual imagination, which includes volumes on Tennyson and Browning, Ten Plays of Shakespeare, Studies in Poetry, and the essays on Clough, Matthew Arnold, Rossetti, and William Morris, published in 1908. Another side of his life not so easy to record was his genius for friendship. For many years his house in Manchester Square was the resort of many of the most distinguished men in art and letters, who fell under the charm of his own brilliant gifts and his delight in human fellowship.

Mr. Brooke married the daughter of Thomas Wentworth Beaumont, M.P., of Bretton Park, Yorkshire, in 1858. Mrs. Brooke died in 1872. His only son was formerly a Unitarian minister in Boston, U.S.A., and subsequently M.P. for Bow and Bromley. One of his daughters is married to Dr. L. P. Jacks, the Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. The funeral took place very quietly on Wednesday, March 22, only members of his family being present. The service in the house was conducted by Dr. Jacks. After cremation, the ashes were interred, as he had desired, close to his favourite seat in the grounds of his house, overlooking the Surrey Weald.

On the same afternoon a memorial service was held in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, conducted by the Rev. H. Gow. There was a large congregation drawn together by common memories and affections from various parts of London. Among those present were Lord and Lady Bryce, Lady Sheffield, the Hon. G. Howard, M.P., Sir E. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. W. B. Odgers, K.C., Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., Mr. Cobden Sanderson, and the Revs. Dr. John Hunter, W. Copeland Bowie, Dr. Charles Hargrove, W. G. Tarrant, J. Harwood, W. H. Drummond, Gordon Cooper and J. Vint Laughland.

In the course of his address Mr. Gow said:—

He always helped us to feel the joy and love that lies behind the tears in things. There was sunshine in his presence and his words. He lifted off our load of fears. We would try to hear him speaking to us of that which lies beyond death and of the beauty of our human life. How many sacred and happy memories come back to us as we think of him! We remember him in the full strength and beauty of his power at Bedford Chapel, and how he preached his Gospel of joy to us. His great message was the glory of life, the happiness of love and the goodness of God. It was no easy superficial optimism. He knew well the hardness and pain of the world. His sympathy with pain and misery was deep and true; but it was a sympathy which saw behind the sin and misery the eternal love of God, and which helped us to see it too. In all times of stress and danger he had the vision of the chariots and horses of the Lord above on the mountains. He endured as seeing Him who is invisible. He spoke, too, with fierce and noble passion against the injustice of the selfish and the cruel. He hated wickedness which hinders loving.

Life for him, Mr. Gow continued, was not a problem but a great and glorious adventure of romance, to be lived with gaiety of spirit and with delight in beauty, in pursuit of a high and noble quest. He spoke not as one who explains, but as one who sees. He left it to others to explain the vision; he gave us the vision, the vision of the glory of the world, the mystery of beauty, the mystery of human goodness, the mystery of love, the mystery of God. He did not concern himself with the mystery of iniquity. It was not so much as a thinker but as an artist and a seer that he appealed to us in his sermons. No preacher of our time has united so closely the power of the artist and the power of the prophet. He made us feel the beauty as well as the goodness of life.

We remember him as one who wrote with wide knowledge and true feeling about art and poetry. No one has written of Turner and Shakespeare and Wordsworth and Tennyson with more love and understanding. He was a great interpreter of their beauty and their meaning. He had a keen insight into character and something of Shakespeare's catholic sympathy with human life.

I associate him always with roses, roses round him in his study nearly all the year, and when he moved into the country a great wealth of roses in his garden. The scent and colour of roses were for him, as for Dante, a symbol of love and of the beauty and promise of life. We associate him, too, with a passionate love for Ireland,—a pride in her great virtues, in her national life, in her idealism, in her courage. Hatred of oppression never led with him to any bitterness of soul. He believed in the essential goodness of humanity. Love for him was the greatest and deepest thing.

Remember his own words in his sermon on the Pattern on the Mount:—

"Death itself is nothing—a momentary pain, a swift dream out of which one awakes with reality of life, the flight of a bird through an arch of gloom into the sunshine beyond. Think nothing of it, think only that thus the vision we have seen in youth, in middle life, in age, shall be shaped into attainment with a fulness of joy."

MEMORIAL TO LORD AIREDALE.

WINDOW UNVEILED IN MILL HILL CHAPEL.

In memory of the late Lord Airedale, says The Yorkshire Observer, a stained glass window has been placed in the Mill Hill Unitarian Chapel, Leeds, by members of the family, and it was unveiled in the presence of a large congregation at the end of the morning service on March 19 by the present Lord Airedale.

The idea which the beautifully executed design by Mr. A. K. Nicholson is intended to express is the continuity of religion in England, beginning with the conversion of our ancestors from the worship of Odin and Thor to Christianity, and coming down to "the slowly-won belief in the one God." In accordance with this conception the figure of Christ is placed in the middle of the upper row of lights. Below this is the scene in the Roman market where Pope Gregory, looking on the fair English boys exposed for sale as slaves, said of them, "Not Angles, but angels." In the light to the left is the landing on the shores of Kent of the missionaries sent by Pope Gregory and their reception by King Ethelbert and his Christian Queen, Bertha. To the right is a representation of the audience given to Paulinus, the missionary sent North by Augustine, by King Edwin of Northumbria and his wise men, one of whom, likening the life of a man to the flight of a sparrow through the hall, spoke for the adoption of the new religion. In the next light is seen the high priest of the idols who, rising from the meeting, mounted his horse and rode to Goodmanham and destroyed the idols and their altars. In the corresponding light, on the left side, are three representatives of the early English Church in Yorkshire—St. Hilda, the Venerable Bede, and Caedmon the poet, with Whitby Abbey in the background. In the upper range of lights, flanking the figure of Christ, are scenes of county and city interest. On the left, as representing the monastic orders which were for eight hundred years so influential an element in the religious life of English folk, is a scene in the cloisters of Kirkstall Abbey, where the aged monk, Serlo, dictated to a younger brother of the order the story of the foundation of Fountains Abbey, which is still preserved. Next to it, with a view of Westminster Abbey during the construction of the nave in the background, are the figures of Wycliffe, the Yorkshire preacher; Tyndale, the translator of the Bible; and Caxton, who set up the first printing press in the precincts of the Abbey, all typifying the beginning of the Reformation. On the other side the story of Leeds Unitarianism is told in two lights, one representing Thoresby and Sharp and Dr. Priestley, the last named conducting his scientific experiments, with the old chapel in the background, and the other the new chapel, with Lord Airedale, who was for sixty years a worshipper in it, and the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, in the time of whose ministry it was built. The various scenes are bound together by a growing tree, symbolising the increase and growth of life and development. At the top of the tracery lights is the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove drawing the tree upwards with his benign rays, with a crown and shield bearing the monogram of the Alpha and Omega above. In the four panels below are the cardinal virtues; in the quatrefoils, shields with the arms of Leeds and Lord Airedale; and in the other tracery lights, cherubim and seraphim.

On the wall near the window is a commemorative bronze tablet with a border of carved Yorkshire stone designed in oak leaves, denoting strength. Above are the arms of the family in enamel. The inscription reads: "In loving memory of James, first Baron Airedale of Gledhow, for sixty years a worshipper in this chapel, this window is erected by his children."

The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Charles Hargrove, who said that the late Lord Airedale began his work at the Mill Hill Chapel as a Sunday School teacher, was a constant attendant at the services, looked upon the chapel with reverent attachment as his home of worship, and gave to all its institutions encouragement and support.

Before unveiling the window Lord Airedale said that ever since the death of his father in March, 1911, it had been the desire of the family to erect a memorial of him somewhere in the city. In placing a memorial window in the Mill Hill Chapel it seemed to them that they had chosen the place most suitable and proper from every point of view. The late Lord Airedale worshipped in the chapel all his life, he took a leading part in all its proceedings, and there was nothing of importance carried on there during his life-time in which he did not take a deep and abiding interest. Whenever he was in residence in Leeds he did not fail to take his part in the services; the chapel was, indeed, his spiritual home, a place in which he loved to worship, a place made sacred to him by memories of many happy years. Lord Airedale then unveiled the window, and after giving a brief description of it, he expressed the thanks of the family to Mr. Nicholson for a design which he thought was the equal of any other of similar character in the city.

Mr. F. J. Kitson, as Chairman of the trustees, accepted the window as "an added beauty to an already beautiful chapel," and a permanent reminder of a life spent with the constant aim of doing good to fellowmen.

The thanks of the congregation to the donors were voiced by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, and the service, during which the late Lord Airedale's favourite hymn, 'God is Wisdom, God is Love,' and the anthem, 'Let us now praise famous men,' were sung, ended with the National Anthem.

THE MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches was held on Saturday, March 18. The first part of the proceedings took place in Cross Street Chapel, when the sermon was preached by the Rev. Alfred Hall of Newcastle-on-Tyne. The musical portion of the service was much enriched by the beautiful singing of the Oldham choir.

The evening meeting was held in the Memorial Hall. The Chairman, the Rev. J. Morley Mills (President of the Association) in proposing the adoption of the Twenty-Fifth Annual Report of the governing body of the Association, spoke of the past year as a difficult one for all the churches, and said that the Association had not been able to keep up to the usual standard of work. As was stated in the report, the number of young men called to the colours during the past year had enormously increased, and it had been difficult to maintain church activities. Looking over the statistical report, however, and comparing the attendances and numbers on the books and the finances with those of the preceding year, the falling off had been very much below what they might have expected. In some cases, indeed, the record had been a little better. Expenses had been curtailed to the utmost limit. He asked all to stand by the Association, for it was the duty of the churches at this time to stand together and to put enthusiasm, earnestness, faith, and power into their work as they had never done before.

Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson, in seconding the adoption of the Report, which was agreed to, mentioned that from the Pendleton Church alone twenty-six young men had gone for military service. In his view this war had demonstrated that the nation was sound in its readiness to make great sacrifices for noble ideals.

Mr. Alfred Pilling of Bolton, in a speech both impressive in tone and full of shrewd comments upon the present situation of the churches in view of the international crisis, expressed the conviction that there should be no waiting for the war to cease, in a spirit of mere marking time, before addressing ourselves to the momentous spiritual work that lies before us. He urged that the needs of men and women were insistent and deep, and that religious workers should set themselves at the present moment to meet these needs. He urged that the character of our services and sermons should have greater regard to the practical needs of comfort and moral sustainment in face of the everyday trials and problems that beset men, upon which theological controversies for the most part have little bearing. He deplored the frequency of announcements of sermons explaining "What we stand for," and would prefer that the preaching should be of such a character that a worshipper might enter a church and be benefited by the service without having any distinctive denominational theology obtruded upon his notice. That there was vast unsettlement of faith and a need to have vital realities brought home to the soul was evident from one incident that occurred to himself, when a business man declared to him that there was so violent a conflict between what he heard on Sunday at church, and the standards he was compelled to follow in business during the week, that he felt the worship to be actually a hindrance to his peace of mind. The speech left the impression of a vast work that our churches were called upon to do if only they had the fit spirit and purpose.

Mrs. Bernard Allen gave a deeply interesting account of the work done by the Belgian Hospital Fund. As the address will appear in the articles which Mrs. Allen contributes to our columns, it is not necessary to give it in this place. Sufficient to say that the meeting listened with admiration as Mrs. Allen unfolded the far-reaching nature and many-sided aspects of this great achievement of mercy and co-operative humanity, and many left the meeting full of renewed zest to work for the scheme A collection was taken for the Fund. The meeting closed with votes of thanks.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Mission was held at Horwich on Saturday, March 11. The proceedings were attended by a large number of representatives from all parts of the Mission area, and were characterised by earnestness and enthusiasm. The Rev. B. C. Constable, of Blackpool, conducted the service at 3 P.M., the sermon being preached by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, who took for his text: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." Contending that the evil of war did not lie in the Divine Nature, but had issued from the evil passions of men, the preacher said that the sight which met their view at the present time was full of mystery and terror; they could not forecast, with any accuracy, what the issue was going to be, but the story of the earth's development, the tragic record of the ascent of man and all they knew of his history, went to show that God was using even such a tragedy as this, which He had not brought about, to serve the purposes of His Providence. They were passing through the valley of death, and they did not know where and when the valley would end. They could not calculate all the danger they might have to go through, but God was with them in the darkness no less than in the light. Mr. C. J. P. Fuller presided at the organ, and was well supported by a full choir, which rendered, with beautiful effect, 'Euroclydon,' a translation of an early Greek hymn, attributed to St. Anatolius. The annual business meeting followed the service, when the President, Mr. W. J. Dale, took the chair. The report and balance sheet, which had been printed and circulated, were taken as read. From the report it was gathered that the activities of the Mission have been seriously interfered with by the war, but the Treasurer's balance sheet disclosed a highly satisfactory financial condition. The usual votes were moved from the chair, and seconded by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, of Nelson; the Rev. Horace Short, of Blackpool; the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent; and the Rev. Richard Lee, of Chesham, Bury. The fifth and last vote of thanks, to the Horwich friends, was moved by Mr. Wm. Noble, and seconded by Mr. Healey, of Heywood. Tea was served at 5 o'clock, and at 6 the evening meeting began, Mr. W. J. Dale presiding. The Rev. R. T. Herford again addressed the gathering, and endeavoured to forecast how the war might affect the welfare of the Churches. Many and important changes had already taken place, and more and possibly greater changes were sure to follow, but he thought it was possible to exaggerate the actual amount of change, and so misjudge the real situation. It might be that some unessential things would disappear, but there was no reason to suppose that in essential matters great modifications were or would be necessary. The splendid way in which their young men had answered to the call of their country showed better than anything else could that they had the right stuff in them, and in the trenches the simple pieties of home and chapel were as the bread of life to them. When they returned they would find the old hymns and the simple service of the sanctuary not less but more helpful. Our lads were passing through an experience of the deepest spiritual significance, and it was incumbent on them to be ready to meet them on that plane. The Rev. Dr. Rattray, of Hindley, spoke forcibly on 'The Duty of Attending Church.' The real causes which determined the course of events were, he said, unseen and spiritual; men, forgetting this truth, sat like Plato's cavemen, looking at the shadows on the wall, and convinced themselves that what they saw was the reality, not realising that they were simply gazing on an empty projection of their own bodies. Religion was concerned with reality, and men cannot do without it. It was their duty to cultivate the religious sense and make it strong and healthy. Had men done this there would have been no war. If peace were made to-morrow, and men went on in the same way, the peace could only be very insecure, and in a short while we should have all the horrors of war on us again. True religion alone could save us from war and all its attendant miseries. Mr. S. Cameron, of Accrington, and Alderman Wadsworth, of Todmorden (the newly elected President), also addressed the meeting.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

Fervour and hopefulness were the features of the well-attended meetings of the Midland Christian Union in Birmingham the other day. It was the Jubilee of the Union, and after 50 years of useful work the Union is now renewing its youth like the eagle.

An unusual but admirable event was that at the afternoon session the paper was read by a Canon of the Anglican Church. Canon Streeter explained the reasons why, to him, the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ seemed to illuminate the obscure but poignant problem of human suffering. The paper received a courteous and thoughtful reception. It is events like these that prove the reality of Christian fellowship, and pave the way for the future re-union of the churches.

At night the sermon by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall seemed to bring together all the religious impressions of a noteworthy day. It was on the base principles of the Union: firstly, the promotion of the real Christ-like spirit; secondly, the freedom from tests. Devotion and Veracity — the preacher's pleading for these two noble watchwords produced a deep effect—while the prayer for our country in time of war seemed like a renewed consecration.

The Service was held in the Old Meeting Church, which Mr. Ronald Jones praises so highly in his book on Nonconformist church architecture. One of the visitors who had not seen the church before remarked on its beauty. "But," he added, "the beauty of the church is not the thought that strikes you first when you enter the building. The first thought falls naturally into the expression, 'Let us pray.'"

There will be strong sympathy with the Rev. E. W. Sealy in his resignation of the pulpit of Upper Brook Street Free Church, Manchester. It has been a difficult post requiring tenacity and courage, and lately Mr. Sealy's health has not been good. Before joining the Unitarian ministry in 1907, he was in orders in the Church of England for four years. He was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and Ely Theological College. We wish for him a new post of active service as quickly as possible.

Our hearty congratulations, though belated, go to the Rev. A. S. Hurn, who has received the degree of Doctor of Literature from the Sorbonne, Paris. Mr. Hurn is a sergeant in the R.A.M.C., and has just returned to active service after being invalided home with enteric. He saw much of the fighting in Gallipoli, and speaks in the strongest terms of the way in which he feels that his experience with the army has deepened his capacity for the ministry.

We are glad to see that Messrs. Williams & Norgate have begun a cheap re-issue of Dr. Jacks' books. The first volume, "Mad Shepherds," is just out for half-a-crown. Into these pastimes of a busy life Dr. Jacks has put more of himself than into any of his other writings. And it is all to his credit, for we place pure literature even above philosophy.

The new leaflet of the Belgian Hospital Fund, which may be had on application to Mrs. Bernard Allen, is adorned with a striking emblematic design, the work of Miss Nora Fry, of Liverpool, who has kindly placed it at the disposal of the Fund. It represents a hospital nurse pleading for help, and pleading for the distressed groups of refugees and wounded soldiers who are seen against a background of ruined buildings.

It is announced that the University Extension Summer School, which will be held at Cambridge this year, will be devoted to things Russian. It is a noble and a timely choice. The barriers of ignorance and a difficult language must no longer stand between two of the great nations who between them hold in their hands so much of the future of the world.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast: the late Mr. James Davidson.—The first Presbyterian Congregation has sustained a serious loss in the death of Mr. James Davidson, one of its most loyal and honoured members. Mr. Davidson, who celebrated his 80th birthday last year, was for several years a tea planter in Assam. On his return to the North of Ireland in 1881 he threw himself with energy into the religious and public life of Belfast, while maintaining a personal interest in his old business. He was particularly identified with the work of the Royal Victoria Hospital. For some years he was Chairman of the Board of Management and also acted as Hon. Treasurer, and he helped to guide its policy during the critical period when the present palatial buildings were in course of erection. He was constant in his attendance at all denominational gatherings. Many Unitarian ministers from England have pleasant and grateful recollections of the hospitality of his home in Windsor Park. Mrs. Davidson, who died some years ago, was the daughter of the late Rev. Samuel Craig Nelson, of Downpatrick. Mr. Davidson had one son and two daughters, with whom the deepest sympathy will be felt in their bereavement.

Billingshurst.—During February and March the services have been conducted by the Rev. S. Burrows, and an afternoon service has been substituted for that previously held in the evening, with gratifying success. Neat little calendars have been issued, and attractive subjects have been advertised. A very pleasant exchange of brotherly helpfulness has taken place during Mr. Burrows' visit. The deep snow made it impossible for the Congregationalist minister to fulfil his engagement a few Sundays since, and as Mr. Burrows was at the evening service he was requested to officiate; he consented, so relieving them from their difficulty. On Wednesday last he gave a lecture entitled "A Tour through Italy and Sicily" in the chapel to an audience numbering about 40. The lantern was lent, and the slides manipulated by the Rev. Mr. Whitburn, the Congregationalist minister, to whom and to the lecturer hearty thanks were accorded for the pleasant evening they had provided. A collection for the funds of the Red Cross Society realized about £1.

Bristol: Domestic Mission.—The Annual Meeting of subscribers and friends of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission was held in the Mission Hall on Monday evening. In the regretted absence of the President, Mr. P. J. Worsley, the chair was taken by Mr. F. Tremain. The report of the Committee, which expressed much satisfaction at the continued prosperity and usefulness of the Mission, was read by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. Sibree. The report called attention to several branches of the Mission's work which had been affected by the war, and to some new institutions which had been started during the year, notably a Boy Scouts Troop, and a Company of Girl Guides, both of which show every sign of prosperity, and promise of usefulness. The Hon. Treasurer's statement of accounts, submitted by Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, showed that the expenditure had exceeded the income, owing to the loss by death of many old and valued subscribers, and the Treasurer appealed for new and increased subscriptions so that the good work now carried on might not suffer. The Missionary, Mr. Thomas Gaylard, presented his annual report, recording the useful work accomplished by the numerous agencies connected with the Mission. The departure of practically all the men of military age, who are serving in His Majesty's forces, has necessitated a certain amount of reorganisation, and a discontinuance of certain institutions such as the Men's Club and the Guild, but compensations have been found in other directions; new institutions for the young have been started, and the enthusiasm and vigour with which these have been taken advantage of by the young people are happy auguries for the future. There has been a marked increase in the attendance at the Sunday evening service, a sign of the increased interest in spiritual things which has been one of the characteristics of this time of war. The reports and accounts were approved and adopted, on the motion of the chairman, who expressed his deep interest in the work of the Mission, and his conviction that in the solution of the problems that would arise after the war, the Domestic Missions of our country would play an honourable and a useful part. The officers and committee were re-elected, and thanks were voted to Mr. and Mrs. Gaylard for their devoted work during the year, to the preachers of the annual Mission sermons, and to the Chairman.

Midland Guilds' Union.—On Saturday, the 18th inst., a successful United Meeting of the Union was held at Lye, the following Guilds being represented: Birmingham (Old Meeting Church), Coseley, Dudley, Kidderminster, Lye, Oldbury, and Walsall. At a Conference after tea, Mr. H. Winbury, of Kidderminster, gave a practical and suggestive address on "The Guild's obligations in relation to Social Service." Referring to several ways in which Guild members could help in the work of catering for the well-being of the adolescent, Mr. Winbury instanced the Sunday School and week-night activities connected therewith as presenting magnificent opportunities for the exercise of an influence for good on the young life of our Churches, which would result in producing fruit in due course, even though, for the time being, the effort put forth may seem to be "wasted on the desert air." A helpful discussion followed, in which the Revs. H. C. Hawkins, I. Wrigley, W. G. Topping, Mrs. Wrigley, Misses M. Hodgkins and M. Twist, Messrs. J. Grainger, J. H. Gray, W. Hicks, A. Wrigley and E. E. Wrigley, took part. The President, the Rev. H. Warnock, occupied the Chair, and voiced the thanks of the Union to the Lye Guild for the bountiful hospitality provided, and a vote of thanks was also accorded to Mr. Winbury for his address. It was announced that the Annual Meeting of the Union would be held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Saturday, May 20, at 4 p.m.

Manchester: Upper Brook Street Free Church.—The Rev. E. W. Sealy, M.A., who placed his resignation in the hands of the Church Committee and congregation some time since, is terminating his pastorate of the Church at the end of this month. His resignation has been accepted with much regret, and the prospect of the appointment and maintenance of another regular minister for at least some time to come is slight indeed. There is much disappointment felt and expressed at this breakdown in the recovery and development of congregational and institutional life which gave such great promise up to the outbreak of the war.

Southern Advisory Committee.—Mr. H. G. Woodford, who desires to take the examination course prescribed by the National Conference, and is now in charge of the church at Trowbridge, has satisfied this Committee as to his character and general fitness, and has been approved as a Lay Worker on Probation.

Torquay.—The congregation of Unity Church have accepted with great regret the resignation of their minister, the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, which will take effect at the end of June, or earlier if Mr. O'Connor so desires. The members of the church have expressed their sincere appreciation of all that Mr. O'Connor has done, together with an earnest hope that he will find a congenial sphere for future work.

Messrs. Dent & Sons will shortly publish translations of three books by Jan Van Ruysbroeck, the fourteenth century Flemish mystic, by C. A. Wynschenk Dom, namely, 'The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage,' 'The Book of Supreme Truth,' and 'The Sparkling Stone.' Miss Evelyn Underhill has revised the text and written a Preface. The same publishers also announce a translation (accompanied by the Latin text) of the 'Liber de diligendo Deo,' or 'Book of the Love of God,' one of the earlier works of St. Bernard, which has never been issued in England in a complete form, by Mr. Edmund Gardner, and 'Vision and Vesture: a Study of William Blake in Modern Thought,' by Charles Gardner.

The following extract from an American letter sent to Miss Brooke Herford, which has just come into our hands, is another indication of the sympathy with Great Britain in the present struggle which prevails so largely in the United States:—"I am taking the liberty of sending you the Report of the War Relief work done in our little town. I thought that you might be interested in reading it. I do not want the English people to feel that we are indifferent to the great calamity that has come to you all, for we know that it is a battle for freedom for the whole world that you are fighting. Every one that I meet is heart and soul for England. If the newspapers say differently, do not believe them. We are helping as best we know, and as time goes on we may know a better way. We hope that the end is not far off, and, until then, be assured we shall work and do what we can."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE know that many of our readers are waiting anxiously for further information about the Hut, which we have promised to provide for the Belgian soldiers in Calais. Next week we shall publish an article by Mrs. Allen, which gives a vivid picture of things as they are, and describes from personal observation both the greatness of the need and the immense amount of good which is likely to be done. The Hut will provide help and healing for the mind and make the burden of exile and the rough conditions of army life more easy to bear. We hope that the Sunday School collections are making good progress. This week has brought us a sheaf of letters from the colonies of refugee children overflowing with the most fervent gratitude for what we are doing to provide them with clothes and other comforts. Among the most touching of them is one written in a large childish hand on behalf of the children themselves. But of this we must write another time. All we can say now is that it has added a new touch of joy to our work.

IT has become a commonplace of the moment to say that we entered upon this war on behalf of freedom, and some people in consequence are eager to draw the conclusion that anything which limits the liberty of the individual to go his own way is inconsistent with our avowed aims. The fact of the matter is that our part in the war is not in the first instance a crusade on behalf of freedom at all. No doubt that enters into it and appeals powerfully to all our noblest instincts; but the one thing which we must never forget is this, that we are at war in fulfilment of our pledged word. There was a treaty obligation, absolutely binding upon every citizen of this country, to defend Belgium in case of aggression by force of arms. Any attempt to evade that obligation would have involved us as a nation in indelible shame. The man who even allows his mind to play with such a possibility is himself in danger of personal dishonour.

IT is this cardinal fact which makes the position of the objector one that it is difficult to respect at the present time. It is useless to appeal to some vague ideal of freedom, if there is even a slight suspicion that the objector is prepared to play fast and loose with solemn promises. Treaty obligations, especially when they are for the defence of the weak, are binding upon every citizen so long as they exist, and they must be honoured not merely by official action but by personal obedience and sacrifice. It is the reality of these public obligations that has startled many private people, who have been content to drift along for years in insular detachment and security. They have had to learn, what every English boy ought to know from his earliest years, that to break our promises to another country in the hour of her need is just as contemptible as to cheat our neighbours or betray our friends.

OF course we do not mean that all the obligations which we have inherited from the past are necessarily just. International relationships demand constant re-adjustment, and possibly there are many treaties which ought to be annulled. This is the business of the political reformer and the social idealist in the years of peace. By all means let us agitate for the repeal of every public obligation which we believe to be contrary to the principles of justice. If we go so far as to regard every promise to use armed force as opposed to the highest welfare of mankind, let us do our best to persuade our countrymen to make a public disavowal of all treaties of that kind. The one thing which as honourable men we cannot do is to turn our backs on them while the bond still exists to which we have put our hand. It is vain for any of us to try to build either an earthly paradise or the kingdom of God on the foundation of broken promises and base betrayals. The man who attempts to do so only involves himself in moral shuffling and weakens his character, and no amount of talking about his own scruples and ideals can save him from the crime of lowering the moral tone of the society in which he lives. This is the real question of conscience at the present time, and compared with it the much narrower personal issues raised by objectors to military service are of small importance.

THE Conference of the Allied Powers, which has been held in Paris, is full of the happiest augury for the future. No doubt it has done much to secure the co-ordination of effort which will lead to a quicker and more triumphant success. That was its primary object. But the more distant results may be equally important; for it has demonstrated the closeness of the ties which unite great peoples, when they contend not for self-interest but for ennobling ideals. The fact that there has been no rift in the alliance through all the changing fortunes of a terrible campaign may well be described as one of the moral miracles of the war. And nothing gives us such good hope that international relationships are on the point of becoming juster and nobler than they have been in the past. Instead of spending our time in speculations about the possibility of again joining hands with Germany, a matter about which we are completely in the dark, it is the part of wise men to build upon the foundation of this vast federation of nations which actually exists. Forced into union by a common danger, they are learning to respect and understand one another, and to honour the common principles of civilisation, which underlie their far-reaching differences in historical tradition and social habit. If we do not throw away our opportunities we are at the beginning of the most fruitful experiment in internationalism which has ever been made.

Rumours, which can only be pieced together very imperfectly, have come through from Germany in the last few days of political unrest and a conflict of opinion about the purpose of the war. It is impossible for us to form any just estimate of the significance of the Socialist revolt under the leadership of Herr Haase. We can only welcome any sign of a better mind, and assure those who struggle for something nobler than military domination, that we regard their effort with cordial sympathy though they are still technically our enemies. It is no light task which they have undertaken, for there is neither political nor moral hope for Germany until she dismisses Kaiserism and everything for which it stands into the limbo of dead idols and accepts constitutional government; and liberty, as most of her lovers have found out to their cost, is not to be wooed and won in a day.

We report elsewhere the speech which M. de Leval made at the "Fight for Right" meeting at Queen's Hall on Tuesday. The loud and prolonged applause showed how deeply the audience was stirred by the presence among them of the man who defended Nurse Cavell before the German court-martial. The ease and grace of his diction, and the sprightly humour with which it was seasoned—he spoke entirely in English—were a veritable triumph. As for his own action, with modest dignity he said nothing about it. He pleaded simply for his outraged people and the supreme cause of justice; and he sent his hearers away quickened with a new desire to do more for the relief of suffering and the defence of right.

We are quietly laying up an immense store of practical experience, which will be invaluable for the social reformer in coming days. No one henceforth can dispute the baneful effects of alcoholic drink upon industrial efficiency, and the economic argument can be pressed home in quarters which have shown themselves quite impervious to the familiar appeals of the temperance advocate. In the same way a great deal of light is being thrown upon the relation between physical conditions and the productiveness of the worker. The committee which is charged with the supervision of the health of munition workers has just issued an interesting statement in which it is pointed out that the problems of industrial fatigue are almost wholly problems of fatigue in the nervous system due to over-pressure:—

> It is not too much perhaps to hope [they say] that the study of industrial fatigue and the science of management based upon it, which is now being forced into notice by immediate need, may leave lasting results to benefit the industries of the country during succeeding years of peace. Our national experience in modern industry is longer than that of any other people. It has shown clearly enough that false ideas of economic gain, blind to physiological law, must lead, as they led through the nineteenth century, to vast national loss and suffering. It is certain that unless our industrial life is to be guided in the future by the application of physiological science to the details of its management, it cannot hope to maintain its position hereafter among some of its foreign rivals, who already in that respect have gained a present advantage. In very many cases, perhaps in almost all, in which staleness is well marked or has even advanced to definite sickness a single day off, given occasionally at the right time, would have avoided much wasteful reduction of capacity and in the worst cases the total loss of many days of work.

Last Saturday Lord Bryce unveiled a tablet at Langport on the house in which Walter Bagehot was born. The inscription simply records that he was born there in 1826, and that he died in 1877. It is a tardy tribute to a man of genius, whose memory has already grown dim, though his fame as a thinker and writer has steadily increased since his death. We glean a few sentences from Lord Bryce's just and enthusiastic tribute:—

> He was [he said] one of the finest minds of his generation—a generation which included Darwin and Tennyson, Kelvin and Huxley, Mill and Grote, and on the European continent Helmholtz, Ranke, Mommsen, Pasteur, Taine, and Fustel de Coulanges. It was a mind of singular delicacy and subtlety, well tempered like a steel blade, keen, strong, and elastic, and it was incessantly active. It was strikingly original, for Bagehot never touched a subject without adding something which no one seemed to have seen or said before, and it was fertile, scattering thoughts and suggestions in such abundance that one felt there was always more to come than that which was expressed. He loved the process of thinking and letting ideas flow forth. He enjoyed the exercise of starting a line of thought to see where it led him, and used a very characteristic phrase when he said that he "liked to play with his mind."

After speaking of him as a scientific thinker in politics and finance, who "applied scientific methods to human subjects with the same kind of skill which the investigator applies in physics or in natural history" and combined practice with theory, Lord Bryce continued:—

> The same qualities were revealed in Walter Bagehot's literary and biographical studies. He loved the study of man, whether in individuals or in communities, and his vivid imagination gave him an insight into character. He always saw the man in the man's writings, and could always interpret the writings by the man; so, although much had been published since his time upon the great writers whose literary quality he analysed, that which he said could still be read with fresh instruction and enjoyment. His brilliant wit and abounding humour enabled him to see things in relations which had struck nobody else. His books were never dull, however serious the topic. His wit was never malicious: he enjoyed the process of transfixing a fallacy, but never directed his shafts against persons. One never saw in him any signs of literary ambition or of any consciousness of his extraordinary powers. They were recognised in his own time by comparatively few persons—by those who had studied along with him at college, like Richard Hutton, by some few economists and bankers who knew him personally, by a very few of those who, like Mr. Edward Freeman, the historian, used to meet him at Quarter Sessions in the county of Somerset. But the circle of those who read his books—a circle comparatively small in 1877—has gone on widening ever since.

We print to-day another instalment of 'Home Camp Notes' by the Rev. T. P. Spedding. These visits of friendship to the men belonging to our churches and Sunday Schools are being carried out under the direction of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Whoever originated the idea was most happily inspired, and no one who reads Mr. Spedding's words with their infectious cheerfulness and good humour can doubt that great good is being done. The whole expense of travelling and organisation is borne by the Association, but we hope that Mr. Spedding will not plead in vain for help towards the social side of his work.

A PROPHET OF LOYALTY.

The name of Prof. Josiah Royce of Harvard is deservedly held in honour in this country. Among our own readers honour is tinged with more personal feelings, for we remember that the contents of his last book on 'The Problem of Christianity' were delivered as lectures in Manchester College, Oxford. Running through these lectures there is a constant emphasis upon the virtue of loyalty. It is the spiritual bond which unites the individual life to the whole of which it forms a part. It is the surrender of the personal will to the larger and more august will of the community. Loyalty, he tells us elsewhere, is personal devotion. It shows itself by action and not by mere sentiments. It involves binding decisions, and brands the decision to do nothing and the refusal to serve as base and inhuman. "If you cannot decide knowingly," he says, "put your own personal will into the matter and therefore decide ignorantly. For ignorant service, which still knows itself as a willing attempt to serve the cause of universal loyalty, is better than a knowing refusal to undertake any service whatever."

Now it is clear that a writer who speaks of loyalty in this way as almost the greatest of the virtues must see in it more than an act of faithfulness to our own whims and desires, however diligently we may pursue them. Behind it, and indeed involved in the very meaning of the word, there is the conception of laws of justice and right, of principles of truthfulness and honour, all "the fundamental duties of the civilised man," upon which the whole social fabric rests. Loyalty in this sense is our own personal effort to uphold the laws, as the defence of private virtue and social welfare and the pledge of ultimate harmony with the Divine Will for everybody. Nor can we imagine any clearer challenge to our loyalty than comes to us in the defiance which lawless and brutal men fling in the face of the social order, reckless of the injury which they do to others in order to win power for themselves. To the loyal everywhere, who speak the common language of justice, this is the unpardonable social sin, and it imposes upon them the duty of resistance, stern, decisive and relentless, lest the human race should drift back into primitive chaos, where men claw and bite and devour one another, because Justice herself is slain.

To us that call has come, and we could not have turned away from it without proclaiming to the whole world that we were renegades to civilisation and feeling in our own hearts that we were traitors to God. Our conviction of moral rightness is clear and final. But it is a source of joy and strength to us to find that men, who watch this grim struggle for the future of civilisation from outside, with minds more detached than our own, wish for a good success for our arms for precisely the same reasons that inspire us to sacrifice everything in order to gain it. In the front rank of this band of applauding witnesses we may place the American prophet of loyalty, who has so often fed our thought and enlarged our ideals in more peaceful days. Prof. Royce, in an address delivered recently in Boston contrasted the attitude of Belgium, unmistakably true "to its international duty, to its honour, to its treaties, to the cause, to the freedom, and to the future union of mankind," with the menace of militant Germany and what it means for the future of international morality.

> Neutral, in heart or in mind [he writes], the dutiful American, when once he has carefully looked upon this picture and then on this, will not and cannot be. He must take sides. And, if he takes sides as I do, he will say :—
> "Let us do all that we as Americans can do, to express our hearty and, so far as we can, our effective sympathy with the united friends of Belgium, who are the foes of those German enemies of mankind. Whenever the war is over, if it ends in the defeat and consequent moral reform of Germany, then in due time let Charity have its perfect work. For we in America have long loved and studied German civilisation, and would be loving it still but for its recent crimes. But now, while the war lasts, and Belgium bleeds, and mankind mourns, let us aid the allied enemies of Germany with sympathy, since the cause of the allied enemies of Germany is the cause of mankind; let us enthusiastically approve of supplying the enemies of Germany with financial aid and with munitions of war, let us resist with all our moral strength and influence those who would place an embargo upon munitions, let us bear patiently and uncomplainingly the transient restrictions of our commerce which the war entails, let us be ashamed of ourselves that we cannot even now stand beside Belgium, and suffer with her for our duty and for mankind, and while we wait for peace let us do what we can to lift up the hearts that the Germany of to-day has wantonly chosen to wound, to betray, and to make desolate. Let us do what we can to bring about at least a rupture of all diplomatic relations between our own Republic and those foes of mankind, and let us fearlessly await whatever dangers this our duty as Americans may entail upon us, upon our land, and upon our posterity. We shall not thus escape suffering. But we shall begin to endure as Belgium to-day endures, for honour, for duty, for mankind."

Words like these require no comment from us, and it is certainly not our intention to press home any moral they may contain for Prof. Royce's own countrymen. That is none of our business. We quote them in order to stimulate our own loyalty and to enlarge our sense of the nobility of this task of resistance, of defence, and of construction to which we have set our hands. Few of us have endured hitherto all that we ought to have done for honour, for duty and for mankind. Nor shall we begin to do so until, laying aside our own petty interests and cares and all disloyal concern for our own wealth and safety, we are able to say: "I have no eyes to see nor tongue to speak save as this cause shall command."

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Hotspur.—O gentlemen! the time of life is short;
To spend that shortness basely were too long,
If life did ride upon a dial's point,
Still ending at the arrival of an hour.
An if we live, we live to tread on kings;
If die, brave death, when princes die with us!
Now, for our consciences, the arms are fair,
When the intent of bearing them is just.

Shakespeare ('Henry IV').

THE PATTERN ON THE MOUNT.

Life should be fully and nobly ornamented, made so lovely with the loveliness of love and graciousness that it will draw men into admiration and imitation, awaken in them silent and poetic pleasure, such a pleasure which ends in love, and which, being love, cannot rest till it is shaped into action which expresses the pleasure of loving. That is the spirit which, wherever it breathes in daily life, advances and adorns the progress of mankind. The useful life must be made beautiful with noble thinking and sacred fire of feeling. The moral life must be wrought in and out with the grace and tender charm which Christ had, and which brought men, and women, and children to his teaching, in sweet content, and grateful rest, until the moral demand was merged in passionate love of the beauty of righteousness. Your teaching, work, home, life, marriage, pursuit of knowledge, pursuit of business, keeping house; your social life, your philanthropy, the reform you advocate, the manual labour you exercise, your association with your friends, workmen, servants, and employers, ought, one and all, to be lived with such grace, courtesy, gentleness, thoughtfulness and lovingkindness, that men may feel as if they were hearing sweet music. Every kind of Divine ornament should be lavished upon them. Life should be a lovely art as well as a science and a religion. And this high ornament and beauty, springing out of love and all its offices, and wrought with the chisel and the pencils of humility, meekness, mercifulness, simplicity, temperature, a quiet spirit, and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, will bless the world, comfort, exalt, enkindle humanity from age to age, give it faith and hope in itself, minister to its noble pleasure, and lift yourself daily and hourly into closer likeness towards that ideal of your life which, when you were in the diviner mood, God showed you on the Mount of Vision. Stopford A. Brooke.

Almighty and everlasting God, the Comfort of the sad, the Strength of sufferers, let the prayers of those that cry out of any tribulation come unto Thee; that all may rejoice to find that Thy mercy is present with them in their afflictions. Amen.

THE LATE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

PULPIT REFERENCES.

Preaching in Manchester College, Oxford, on Sunday, March 26, Dr. Carpenter said:—

Dr. Stopford Brooke had many elements of the Irish genius, its capacity for vision, its fervour, a certain high sensuous passionateness exalted by continuous self-discipline into the power of sympathetic divination into deeps of the spirit and secrets of character understood by few. He had the swiftness of impulse, the splendid courage, of his race; and he was guarded against its melancholy by the energy of faith and the almost boyish vitality which he kept with such enchanting freshness to the end. Master of divers tongues he ranged over wide fields of literature, and to the knowledge of men and books, gathered in two great capitals, London and Berlin, he added the rarer appreciation of art.

When he returned to England from Germany nearly fifty years ago, to begin his ministry in St. James's Chapel as an Anglican clergyman, he found the souls of thinking men vexed in many ways. The dogma of Biblical infallibility had been destroyed. The investigations of the Pentateuch by Dr. Colenso had shaken the credibility of Moses. Darwin had substituted the Ascent for the Fall of man. Some of the most notable leaders of science had challenged the fundamental assumptions of theology. The world could be explained without a God, and man accounted for without a soul. Mr. Brooke was not dismayed. He recognised, partly with sorrow and partly with righteous indignation, how much of the bitterness of contemporary strife was due to the timidity of Church teachers who would not face the facts and barred their beliefs from all contact with the world of daily realities. He, therefore, boldly claimed the open ranges of politics, history, literature, science, art, as within the province of the Christian ministry. In volume after volume of sermons he spread his ideas with kindling power, enhanced when he preached them with the magnetism of his personality, his quickening utterance. None of those who heard him can fail to recall, as they read the printed page, the glowing countenance, the movements of eye and hand, the voice of appeal or tenderness, of challenge or comfort or command. He lived through the great conflict and he never quailed, but kept a firm hold of "the things unseen" through it all.

Next to his impassioned interpretation of the Gospel of Jesus, which was the foundation of his whole religious life, came its expansion and enrichment through the manifold products of the human spirit, above all through poetry. In Wordsworth and Tennyson he found the two master-minds in the great roll of English singers in the last century, and he made the exposition of their teaching the vehicle of much of his own deepest thoughts on life. A great poet, he said, "ought to expand men's sympathies over the great interests and movements of nations; to beautify the great truths on which the moral and political progress of nations rests; to add emotion to the ideas of liberty and brotherhood; to bid men look forward for not only their own country's highest good, but for the restoration of all things; to keep the hope and faith of a millennium ever before our eyes; to be the prophet of mankind." For such a work—and it was his work as preacher no less than the poet's (I do not forget that he was poet too)—gifts of heart were needed, no less than of intellect; apprehension of character by sympathy, love for the unlovely and ungentle as well as for the fair and good, never despairing even of the worst, undaunted by the most grievous onsets of evil, assured of the ultimate victory of right, and hence joyous and serene even in the most dire assaults. Such gifts of sympathy led him to action. He was no recluse, looking out from a mountain height above the mighty battle of the world. He lived in its midst, he did not shrink from its turmoil. Sorrow might desolate his home; suffering might sometimes check his buoyant energy; he never quailed. He knew men of many minds, politicians, administrators, concerned with affairs, as well as men of letters and science and art. He cared for those who were in danger of being mastered in the bitter fight with drink, for the children in the slums who knew nothing of the wonders of the country in summer-time, for the tired work-girl needing rest. Innumerable little kindnesses and courtesies flowed from him even to strangers day by day. Here he was at home in his humanities, and here he found the key to his comprehension of the poetry of man, above all of Shakespeare, as it was also the source of his insight into the vast unending drama of existence.

He knew the artist's secret, the pursuit of the ideal. For him, too, life was a glorious adventure. As fast as one hope was realised, one achievement made good, another rose fairer and clearer in the distance, towards which he must shape his course, like the ancient voyager before whose eyes

> Gleams that untravelled world whose margin fades
> For ever and for ever when I move.

I would not wish to be the man, young or old, who can read the last pages of his study of Tennyson without emotion, as he companies with the poet flying forward (in the person of Merlin) to the supernal gleam. To pursue it, he tells us, is the love of life; to die in its pursuit is joy, for beyond death its glory yet more brightly shines. "Therefore now on the verge of death he gives his last message to the young, calling on them to follow, as he has done, the light that was never reached, but never failed:—

> And so to the land's
> Last limit I came—
> And can no longer,
> But die rejoicing,
> For thro' the Magic
> Of Him the Mighty,
> Who taught me in childhood,
> There on the border
> Of boundless Ocean,
> And all but in Heaven
> Hovers The Gleam.

Not of the sunlight,
Not of the moonlight,
Not of the starlight!
O young Mariner,
Down to the haven
Call your companions,
Launch your vessel,
And crowd your canvas,
And, ere it vanishes
Over the margin,
After it, follow it,
Follow The Gleam.

"Who would not wish," cries Brooke, "to have written that? Who would not wish to have so lived as to be able to leave that last impulse to the young, to cry in death that prophet-cry?" So assured was he that The Gleam would be there to follow in the far Beyond that he could look forward to the entry on new Being with passionate anticipation. "I expect," he once said to a friend, "I expect the day of my death to be the most romantic day of my life." For what is death? "Death itself," he told us in one of the last sermons which he preached in this chapel, "Death itself is nothing, a momentary pain, a swift dream out of which one awakes into the reality of life, the flight of a bird through an arch of gloom into the sunshine beyond. Think nothing of it. Think only that then the vision we have seen in youth, in middle life, in age, shall be shaped into attainment with a fulness of joy." For such a Teacher as this have we not reason to thank God?

The Rev. J. H. Weatherall at Essex Church.

In his later years Mr. Stopford Brooke often preached to large congregations in Essex Church, where some of the former members of Bedford Chapel now worship. Last Sunday morning, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall paid a tribute of affectionate respect to his memory. He said the papers were full of biographies of him, and the pulpit was not the place for biography, but many of them that day could not help recalling his rich and vivid personality. "Grace" was the word that best described the impression he made. There was in him grace of personal manner; grace of mind, expressing itself in beautiful thoughts, imagery, language; and grace of spirit, soaring upwards always to the noblest regions of motive and aspiration. Of him might well be used some words he once wrote of a kindred spirit: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ was in his heart, and it lit up his countenance." He was poet as much as preacher; the better preacher b cause he was a poet; but yet a greater preacher because he was pre-eminently the seer. His was a mind with a Rossettian faculty of definite sensible imagery. He could translate into concrete realities those spiritual things which to most people remained faint and vague. He saw the bush burn, and made men feel that the ground was holy. The world of spirit to him was full of voices, like Prospero's island. He had heard them; he told us of their meaning, and told it so intensely that he made us know he had been speaking face to face with God, and knew Him as a familiar and beloved friend. And there was always in him something of the ancient chivalry. "I remember that once I had to write to him on some small matter of College business. He might easily have written some brief and formal reply. But he knew I was soon leaving College, and he wrote touching words of the joys and pains of the struggle, and urging faithfulness to ideals when the fierce pull of the outer world should come. It was as if some Lancelot had graciously stooped for a moment to counsel and encourage a new and untried recruit. And his letter went on to repudiate humbly some words I had dared to write to him; again it might have been Lancelot saying:—

. . . . . In me there dwells
No greatness, save it be some far-off touch
Of greatness to know well I am not great.

The preacher went on to ask if Stopford Brooke was mistaken in coming out of the Church when he ceased to believe in miracle. The answer was an emphatic negative. For the foundation virtue of religious teaching is veracity, and inside the Church his preaching thenceforth would have necessarily lacked that note of personal conviction and reality which distinguished his utterance. He gave up the certainty of preferment and extensive influence, but outside his influence, though limited, was intense in its character.

The sermon concluded with a hope for the early realisation of a Comprehensive National Church which should include all our types of religious thought and experience, a Church as wide as the life of the whole nation, and based on the organisation of devotion, not of belief. That ideal was more practicable than was generally supposed, for the war is proving over again that the fundamentals of the necessary religion are seldom in the principles that have separated the Churches so long and which have been the battle cries of sectarian fighting. They consist of simple things like brotherly love, patience, helpfulness and hopefulness, and reverence towards God.

THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—I have waited a week to see if there would be any comment on the note on this subject in your issue of March 18, and especially on the sentence: "Thousands of men are saying to themselves, if conscience involves this crankiness of mind, this lack of manly fibre, and this shallow contempt for public interest, then the less of conscience we have the better." No doubt thousands of men speak thus contemptuously of the conscientious objector, but the editor of a religious newspaper will surely not dispute the statement that every man must obey the dictates of his own conscience. One man's conscience forbids him to take human life under any circumstances; another's conscience prompts him to kill as many Germans, Austrians, Turks and Bulgarians as he can during the period of the war. Of course, I allow that there are many slackers, whose object in life is safety and comfort, but there are also thousands of genuine conscientious objectors (and these not limited to Quakers and Christadelphians), though you do not appear to believe in their genuineness, as you say: "For ourselves we would say with all the emphasis in our power that if we want to see conscience at work we must go not to the tribunals but to the camps." I say with all the emphasis in my power that conscience is to be found at both.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. Ryland.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—Miss Martineau's protest is timely and necessary. The newspapers to-day report that one member of a London tribunal sought to overcome the scruples of a young Jewish objector by asking him: "Who killed Christ"! But let us be fair to the tribunals. The task set them is an exceedingly difficult one, and it seems to me that their stock question, as to what the objector "would do if his mother or sister were in danger from a German soldier," is eminently reasonable. The case put is not altogether supposititious. The question is surely intended to impress on the objector the facts of the situation. The brutes who organised the wholesale massacre and violation of civil populations in Belgium are unrepentant; and as reliable reports suggest, they are buoying up the spirits of the soldiers with promises that England's turn to be ravaged is soon to come. The only ground for Miss Martineau's trust that England's turn will never come is confidence in the man-power of our army and navy. The German soldiers are at the door threatening our mothers and sisters. The question resolves itself into this: Are we to be content merely to leave to our friends and neighbours the duty of holding the spoilers back? To hold them back it is, unfortunately, necessary to be "trained in the art of killing." Those who share these views, and regard this war as, for Britain, a war of liberation, necessary and right, can surely not be altogether content with the suggestion that their conscience is duller and coarser than is that of the "objectors." They must at least regard the matter as one for argument. That argument by members of the tribunals has done good in some cases I could show, and there has been reported in the newspapers the case of a conscientious objector who withdrew his appeal the day after a Zeppelin crew had dropped a bomb in the street in which he lived! Similar outrages have been happening for a year and more past, but the young man's imagination was not stirred until the sound of a bomb's explosion had actually reached his ears. I could suggest a district in London in which, with like advantage, a bomb might be dropped! Meanwhile we have questions from the tribunals.—Yours, &c.,

Arthur Golland.

HOME CAMP NOTES.

There were signs of spring over the plain and the hill sides last week. True the trees were late and the waters were still out on most of the cross country roads. But a soldier wore a primrose in his cap, and soon you found the bank where he had plucked it. Linnets were about as tame, or bold, as any robin. The hedgerows were full of new spikes, and the ploughed fields looked warm and rich. In front of far off fleckless skies masses of white cloud hung over the low hills, as though the heavens had opened and discharged their artillery over the mounds and ditches of these ancient British camps. The valleys rang with the clatter of musketry, and the long boom of heavy guns, and as the sun went down he brandished golden swords of victory at close of day. In the camps you could pass along the lines dry-shod. Men were laying out small gardens between the huts, perhaps with the hope of seeing flowers there later, like those few in Flanders who planted tulips by the thousand on the home side of their officers' dug-outs. Other men were shaking army blankets, scrubbing tables and benches, letting in more daylight—the spring cleaning was in full swing. "Pack up your troubles in your old kit bag, and smile, boys, smile." When the week-end came fresh gales blotted out all the fair beauty of the landscape, made an ooze of the lines once more, and incidentally broke into the plans of a pedestrian who had seventy good miles to his credit, and hoped to add another twenty before the end of his journey.

Two nights last week we had little parties of our men, and in both instances the lady of the house provided more than I paid for. They had boys of their own away, and knew what it meant. Some of our men walked five miles each way, and they had a good time. They came from different schools, and were practically all strangers to each other; but before parting the correspondents were chosen, and they will know each other better for the rest of the time. If the pleasure that these meetings and chances of acquaintanceship create could be witnessed I think every minister and superintendent would do his utmost to make my list complete, so that each Unitarian should at least know who were the other Unitarians in his camp. Oftentimes men are living within a hundred yards of each other without knowing that they have this bond in common. One of the R.A.M.C. I called on had been a lay missioner with the Van Mission when the war broke out. He went with me to make some further calls. As we left one hut I mentioned the name of the next friend we were to call on. "Mr. S! is he one of ours'? What a pity I didn't know that, for we met him a quarter of an hour ago." Fortunately a message reached S. and he was able to join us later in the evening. The same afternoon some addresses were being confirmed in an orderly room, and a man was detailed to show the way. As we were about to leave another orderly asked if he might be allowed to take the duty. Permission was accorded, no doubt to the satisfaction of the man released. Outside the hut the volunteer explained his offer by "Excuse me, aren't you Mr. S.?" I knew his family, and we were glad we had met; but his name was not on my list; no names had come from his school. On the other hand a man from Sheffield was missed in a tantalising manner. He had been moved about a good deal, and I followed the clues until the hour for another appointment arrived, and I had to abandon the search. A day or two later, passing through the same district by train, a soldier entered the compartment, and in the course of our conversation I asked if he knew B., the A.S.C. man I had been looking for. To my surprise they turned out to be friends, were to meet that night and return by the last train, and we arranged to meet under the station clock. Two of us were there, but B. went back some other way. I hope he got my messages. It is a little world; the chances of meeting men and making them acquainted are not so remote as they might seem, and friends do turn up in unexpected places. Here is another instance. Two officers learned the nature of my work with a good deal of interest, asked many questions about the number of our men; whether we were "troubled" with conscientious objectors, and what war views prevailed among us. Shortly the captain asked, "But has religion anything to say about the war that is worth listening to; has it not signally failed to give any real lead to men?" "Is it religion you mean, or something else?" I asked. "Well, what has the Church of England, for example, had to tell us by way of helping?" The reply was that, of course, each church must speak for itself, but I believed our Unitarianism supplied an answer to their questions which men found helpful, if only because our people did not think, like some others, that God was responsible for the war, but that it was entirely of human origin, and in defiance of the plain laws of God. "Why, that is exactly what Dr. B. says, and now I come to think of it," turning to his companion, "you are a Unitarian." The doctor admitted that he was one in Sydney, and that he believed the causes of the war must be sought for along human lines and not superhuman.

I have acknowledged with gratitude a number of donations (about £6 altogether) which have enabled me to give some of our men an "evening off." But £6 does not go far, it has all been spent, and the whole summer is before us. May I therefore make a definite appeal for assistance for this social side of the work? None of the money is used for the general expenses, which are borne by the Association. In all the large centres of population there is usually entertainment and hospitality in abundance for the troops in the neighbourhood. Much is done to brighten the soldier's lot. Even, however, under these best conditions there is much lacking, and none of these attentions compensate for the sacrifices that have been made. But what of the men in the remoter and unpopulated districts? In my last journey I visited a dozen camps, some of which were seven miles from a railway station. The largest village in the district, I think, has about 1,400 inhabitants. In these places there is no hospitality, no entertainment. In the camp there will be the Y.M.C.A., the Church Army, and the Salvation Army huts, perhaps a cinema and the canteen. But what are they all, good, bad and indifferent, in the midst of these thousands of men? Except for the hour spent together on the occasion of my visit, our men in these camps have had no friendly contact with the outside world for months, and they are in the same plight with thousands of others, of every sort, in their community. Is it to be wondered at that the bit of a change means so much to them, and that they show gratitude out of all proportion to the little kindnesses that I am able to convey to them on others' behalf? If I had my way I would bring these men together if only just for the sake of a good meal on a table with a clean white cloth, and mind not at all if I had nothing but the pleasure of seeing them, for once, "as though they were at home." "Tea pots, boys!" "Ah, yes; let's see, what is a tea pot?" And chairs! Only the gospel of creature comforts, you say; but then it is not months since it was preached to us: we haven't wintered with one enclosed stove for forty of us in a wooden hut, a three plank bed, and a bench by day. It is a splendid system for hardening men, and it is wonderful how readily they accommodate themselves to it; but the softening mood of a social hour hurts nothing, perhaps helps something, and in any case sends them back to the strenuous life with a bigger courage of going on, and a warm glow in their hearts for some unknown friends. There are a score of interests to watch and sustain, people are anxious to help wherever there is need, and I cannot help thinking that if they realised the loneliness of English soldiers in many of these English camps they would spare something "in addition" for those who are our sons and brothers. And I plead that in so far as one man can carry that help to little groups of them the means to do so should be forthcoming in abundance.

I wish to acknowledge receipt of the following sums in aid of the social side of this work, and shall value many further contributions to be used only in the behalf of the men, and independently of the ordinary expenses of the work: Rev. THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT MOVEMENT.

ADDRESS BY THE POET LAUREATE

In spite of the inclement weather, there was a good attendance at the second Queen's Hall meeting in connection with the Fight for Right Movement, when, in addition to notable speeches by the Chairman, Mr. Robert Bridges (Poet Laureate), Mr. W. E. Appleton (General Secretary Federation of Trades Unions), Miss Evelyn Underhill, Mr. J. W. Williams, and M. de Leval, of the Belgian Bar, who defended Nurse Cavell, a choir of 500 voices rendered stirring songs suitable to the occasion, three of them written specially for the Movement. Sir Hubert Parry's setting of William Blake's 'And did those feet in ancient time,' written at the request of the Poet Laureate himself, is very beautiful, and the four lines from William Morris's 'Sigurd the Volsung,' beginning "When thou hearest the fool rejoicing," gained added force from Sir Edward Elgar's stately and characteristic rhythm. But the most appreciated item on the programme was 'The Reveille,' by Bret Harte, which was sung magnificently by Dr. Walford Davies's Male Voice Choir.

Speech by the Poet Laureate.

Mr. Bridges at the outset met the popular criticism that there are already too many societies and that the need for yet another, to "fight for right," does not exist, by quoting some words from Romain Rolland's latest book, which, he said, seemed to him the title-deeds of their Movement. They are as follows: "A great nation assailed by war has not only its frontiers to protect; it must also protect its good sense. It must protect itself from the hallucinations, injustices and follies which the plague lets loose. To each his part: to the armies the protection of the soil of their native land; to the thinkers the defence of its thought." These words expressed what they all knew and believed, that the salvation of a country depends upon the spirit of her people; that the danger is that this spirit may go wrong, may be blinded by passion, led astray by self-interest, drowsed by self-security, bewildered for want of reason and sound sense. The aim of the Fight for Right Movement was not to create a national spirit: we had got one,

Its object was to instruct, steady, encourage, aid, and inform the national spirit, to organise the non-combatants into a spiritual force as determined on victory, and as united in purpose, as our armies in the field and our navies on the sea, so that when our men return they may find something on which to join hands with us. They desired to show, with their soldiers and sailors, an irresistible front, in order to convert these years of sorrow and trial into historic glory. A hundred years ago, when Napoleon was over-running Europe, a cloud overhung our country which appeared to the men of that day as dark and black as the cloud which hangs over us now, yet in those days William Blake wrote the verses which he (Mr. Bridges) had asked his friend, Sir Hubert Parry, to set to music for them, in which he recalled the England that had at one time seemed to be the home of the "holy Lamb of God." He bewailed the fall of the nation from that early time of promise, and its straying into the paths of covetousness, but he cries :—

I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall the sword sleep in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land.

And Jerusalem, in Blake's phraseology, it must be remembered, meant the City of God on the foundations of peace.

M. de Leval's Address.

M. de Leval, who was received with prolonged applause on rising, said he had had constantly in mind while the other speeches were being made Raphael's familiar picture of 'St. George and the Dragon,' with its background of mountains and the city of Florence, and the figure of the poor maiden kneeling down at a little distance watching the fight going on for her sake. There had never been a moment in the history of England when the symbolism of St. George and the Dragon had been more literally carried out. In this war England did not fight for Rhinegold, for territory, or for power; it just fought for right, and if Raphael had been alive to-day he would undoubtedly have painted a series of panels, the first of which would have been another picture of the dragon coming out of his den, with no St. George on the scene, and, for background, Ypres, Dinan, Louvain. Between the dragon and those cities they would see the innocent maiden once more, not kneeling down, however, but standing facing the foe. In vain the dragon urges that he must pass; that if he is allowed to do so he will hurt nobody; this poor maid (who is Belgium), although she knows she is small and weak, knows too that there is something dearer than anything else—it is honour, and so she replies: "I will fight for right, and you shall not pass!" M. de Leval in moving words went on to describe what that determination had cost Belgium—the burnt cities, the ruined homes, the tyranny which reigned in every town, almost in every street; the horrors which had burnt themselves into the brains of the children, such as no child of the twentieth century ought ever to have seen; and yet the spirit of the people was not crushed. They knew their cause was just, and were sure of victory. Last year when the time came round for celebrating the national fête day, which is usually a very joyous affair, word went round secretly in Brussels that the best way to mark the day under such circumstances was by silence, and so for the first time in the history of the country, on July 21 every house and every café was closed. M. de Leval also described some of the methods which had been used by the Germans to get the people to work, in some cases threatening punishment for the whole town in which they lived if they did not obey, but not a single man turned up in obedience to the demand. This was the way in which non-combatants showed their spirit, that spirit which, because it was inspired by a just cause, could not be conquered. One of the most wonderful sights in Belgium now was the gatherings in the churches. In the Place Royale in Brussels hundreds of people congregated on the steps of the church waiting for the conclusion of Mass, so that they could hear on the organ the national anthem, the Brabançon, which they could not hear anywhere else. It was Cardinal Mercier who had achieved this miracle of drawing the people together, making them feel that their patriotism was their religion, and their religion, patriotism. This national solidarity was further strengthened by the unselfish and practical way in which Belgians of all classes, some 70,000 of them, were helping the relief committees for which America and England had done so much, and aroused in the hearts of the people such an intense feeling of gratitude. In conclusion M. de Leval made a special appeal to those present to fulfil their responsibility in the matter of the Fight for Right, and to make those sacrifices which, as yet, people in England have not been compelled to make, but which must be made if the end they desired was to be gained.

MANSFORD STREET MISSION, BETHNAL GREEN.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Mansford Street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green, was held in the Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hall, Hampstead, on Friday, March 24. Owing to the inclement weather there was only a small attendance, but the proceedings were marked by the usual spirit of deep interest in the admirable work which is being done under the leadership of the Rev. Gordon Cooper. The chair was taken by Mr. Harold Wade. The repo t were presented by the Acting Sec., M. W. J. Clark, and the Treasurer's sta e-ment by Mr. A. H. Punnett. The Rev. Gordon Cooper gave a long and interesting account of the activities of the Mission during the year, and was able to announce that with the exception of the Mens' Club, which had been greatly depleted by the call to military service, all the work had been maintained at a high level of efficiency. At the end of his report he referred to his own attitude as a man of military age in the following terms :—"May I conclude my report of the year's work with a few words of a more personal character? In common with other ministers who are still within the military age, I have been continually confronted, during the past twelve months, with the question of enlistment for some form of military service. I became fully convinced in my own mind that my duty lay at Mansford Street, and that the best service I could render at the present time was to keep the work at the Church and Mission going as efficiently as possible. In this decision I was supported by a few friends to whom I appealed for advice, and on whose judgment I could rely far more than on my own, and I trust that my action in this matter will be approved by the general body of subscribers to whom I now present my report. It has not always been easy to stay at home and to go on quietly with one's usual work when so many of one's friends, both at the Mission and elsewhere, have answered the call to service in other more exciting and more dangerous fields; but I believe in the work of the Church and Mission—in its power to help and its influence for good in these times of stress and anxiety—and, because I felt that that work should be continued and not unduly interrupted, I have chosen to stay at my post."

In moving the adoption of the reports the Chairman said that all who knew Gordon Cooper knew that he would have been the first to join in so just a cause, but he had elected to remain because his duty lay at home, and they would all support him in his decision. His report might be described as very interesting, very modest, and very frank. It was a great thing that the flag had been kept flying. It was, he thought, a remarkable thing that boys who had learnt the value of discipline like members of the B.O.B. and the Boy Scouts had joined the Army to a man. Speaking of the churches and the war, he said that it was not conceivable that men who were in hourly risk of their lives did not turn their thoughts to God and the life to come. Introspection must have taken place as it had never taken place before, and hundreds of thousands of men must be deciding that if they returned, they would make life a better thing than it had ever been before. The deficit in the Mission accounts, which had been greatly relieved by a generous donation of £100 from Mr. Ronald Jones, did not trouble him. He seemed to have lived in an atmosphere of church deficits all his life, but somehow the churches went on. We were a small but we were not an ungenerous folk, and work like that at Mansford Street would never be allowed to suffer for lack of funds.

Dr. Hargrove, in seconding the resolution, spoke as the youngest member of the Rosslyn Hill congregation, and also as one of its most irregular attenders. He thought that the connection between Rosslyn Hill Chapel and the Mansford Street Mission was a very happy thing. It was best not to try to do things in Hampstead, but to go into a district where the work was really needed. It would be a bad thing for them if they were to settle down contentedly into the old conditions after the war. They must take up all the martial spirit and make it active in another direction, remembering that there was a war to be carried on in London. There were, for instance, the questions of drink and sanitary conditions and the living wage. These were the questions to which they must apply their minds with a determination to solve them and set them right.

Mr. R. P. Jones moved a resolution of cordial thanks to the Rev. Gordon Cooper and the devoted band of helpers and workers at the Mission. In the course of his speech he referred to the way in which our expectations in the early days of the war about social misery and shortage of employment had been falsified. The belief in a coming religious revival had also been disappointed. Instead of this, in the past year there had been decreased attendance, though less financial difficulty in the churches than was anticipated. Over 10,000 young men had been withdrawn from our own churches, and their absence necessarily made a great difference to the figures of attendance at public worship. People who had been accustomed to take religious views of life before had probably had their thoughts deepened, but the outsiders had remained outside. Now there was an expectation that there would be a revival of religious interest after the war owing to the experiences through which our men had passed, but it did not follow that it must and would take place. He himself was inclined to think that men would gravitate back to their old habits, for human nature was a very obstinate thing, and when it got back from an abnormal experience it would return to familiar thoughts and ways. Here, he felt, was part of the great value of the Mission. The young men who had gone out from it would find that its worship and institutions had been maintained, and that it was ready to receive them during the difficult period of settling down after they came home.

The Rev. F. K. Freeston, in seconding the resolution, remarked that it was impossible to say in Mr. Cooper's presence what they felt in their hearts. It was a privilege for all the helpers to serve under such a commanding officer. His ministry had been one of comfort, and it was never more needed than now.

Mr. Cooper briefly replied to the resolution. The officers and committee were elected on the motion of Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., seconded by the Rev. J. A. Pearson, and the meeting closed with a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by the Rev. H. Gow, and seconded by the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

MEMORIAL TO WALTER BAGEHOT.

TABLET UNVEILED AT LANGPORT.

Honour done to the memory of Walter Bagehot should even in these hurrying days receive some notice in The Inquirer, for did not The Inquirer print some of his early work? On a wild March day when the flooded meadows were like an inland sea, and gleams of sunlight touched the grey clouds, a little company gathered in the quaint town hall of Langport to listen to an address by the Right Hon. Viscount Bryce on the life and work of little Langport's great townsman. The room was small and crowded by an audience eager to hear the veteran statesman recall his friend of earlier days, and express the gratitude of innumerable students for Bagehot's brilliant work. This address will probably be issued in some permanent form at a later date, but that "will not bring home the river and sky," nor the quaint town hall, nor the long narrow street, nor the atmosphere of that March day, which in its changing light on the landscape lent to the speaker one of his similitudes, for it was like the light which the genius of Walter Bagehot shed on many a dark subject. The search-light of his genius played on "the dismal science," and lo, it was dismal no longer. He brought to the study of economics the method of the discoverer. Things to him were not stagnant and stationary, but for ever on the move. He made allowances for motion in his calculations. He studied the moving crowd. He beheld in life "the power of creation which makes and remakes itself at every instant." To investigate and discover was a delight to him. This and no literary ambition was what induced him to write, and it was this which made him one of the most fascinating talkers in a period when talk was especially good. And his work abides. Its freshness is remarkable. His audience was never so large as it is now, and "nowhere is he more appreciated than in the United States, where he is looked upon as the founder of a new era in the study of political economy."

It was fitting that the thanks of the meeting to Lord Bryce for his address should have been voiced by Mr. Hirst, the editor of the paper so intimately associated with Bagehot, the Economist. Then to the plain stone house, close to the Bank, just over the way, where Bagehot was born in 1826. The tablet to inform "all and sundry" of that fact was unveiled, after a few more words from Lord Bryce, and the proceedings were at an end. Home then over the wind-swept plain, and by the inland sea, glorified for a few minutes by a magnificent rainbow.

C. E. P.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

The name of Dr. J. E. Carpenter should have been included in our list of those present at the Memorial Service for the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke last week. During the past term Dr. Carpenter has been busy with his work as Wilde Lecturer in Natural and Comparative Religion at Oxford. He has now gone for a holiday into Devonshire. He is engaged at present in editing a small volume of essays and spiritual counsels for war-time by some of our ministers, which will be issued shortly by the Lindsey Press.

Dr. Edgar Thackray, whose volume 'The Revelation of God in Nature and Man' has just been issued by the Lindsey Press, is one of the able men whom Manchester University and the Unitarian Home Missionary College have sent into the ministry in recent years. He studied as a Hibbert Scholar at Harvard, where he took the degree of Ph.D. in 1907. He is at present minister at Stand, near Manchester, where he succeeded the Rev. R. T. Herford, when the latter was appointed Librarian of Dr. Williams's Library. His book, which is intended to be an introduction to the study of natural theology "along fresh and more modern lines," is one of the series of "Modern Handbooks of Religion."

Mr. Alfred Pilling made one of his stirring speeches a few days ago at the Public Meeting of the Manchester District Association. Much of it was a vigorous challenge to church members to be more active. No minister can by himself make a living church. The vigorous ministry of the congregation is just as essential.

This kind of speech is an admirable variation on the common theme of the short-comings of ministers. Ministers, of course, are a peccant race. But it is noticeable that the more a layman throws himself into church work, the less numerous are his censures of the ministry and the more frequent his appeals to the church members to rise to their privileges and responsibilities.

Mr. Pilling is one of the most energetic helpers of our South Lancashire churches. He is in the prime of life, and though not physically robust, he does the work of half-a-dozen ordinary men. He is a Chartered Accountant by profession, with a big and growing connection; he is also an industrious politician. But the welfare of our churches is his deepest interest, and in some way or other he makes the time to work for our societies and to speak at our meetings.

Bank Street Chapel, Bolton, is Mr. Pilling's religious home. His family has been connected with it for two centuries. He was a scholar from childhood in its Sunday school, and he is still a teacher of the Men's Class, as well as Secretary of the church. Like many another public man, he developed his conspicuous talent for clear thinking and fluent expression through his work as a Sunday school teacher. The success of the unforgettable Bolton National Conference was largely due to his talent for organisation. He is a J.P. for Bolton.

One of Mr. Pilling's favourite maxims is that difficulties are made to be conquered. That shows his spirit. One of his principles is that small remedies are worse than none. And that shows his wisdom.

The new ministry of the Rev. Lawrence Clare at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, has made a beginning which is full of excellent promise. Both the morning and evening congregations are recovering something of their former vigour.

In connection with the Liverpool Branch of the Workers' Educational Association Dr. Stanley A. Mellor, of Hope Street Church, is announced to give two lectures, on April 1 on 'The Conflict of Science and Religion,' and on April 8 on 'Philosophy and Religion.' They are part of a course of historical and unsectarian lectures which are being given on Saturday evenings under the general title 'A Century of Religious Development.' Frank discussion is invited.

A Robert Collyer Memorial Pew has been set aside permanently for the use of strangers in the Church of the Messiah, New York. It is indicated by a bronze tablet placed on the end of the pew which for thirty years was assigned to Dr. Collyer and used by members of his family.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Mansford Street Mission at Hampstead last week Mr. Ronald Jones said that he could not find words to express his admiration for the work which the Y.M.C.A. was doing for our army. The new meaning conveyed by those letters was one of the great changes of the war.

In a letter to The Common Cause Miss Eleanor F. Rathbone makes the following original suggestion about Study Circles for the study of problems arising out of the war: "May I suggest that for many people the best kind of 'study circle' consists of one person; the best time of meeting is any hour between 11 P.M. and 7 A.M., and the best place of meeting is Bed. It is not difficult to form the habit of waking at a fixed time; reading for half-an-hour and thinking for half-an-hour, more or less, and then going to sleep again, and for many busy people it is the only practicable way."

The devotional booklet called 'On the March' specially designed for use by soldiers and sailors on active service has no name on the title-page, but it is an open secret that it has been compiled by the Rev. W. E. George, M.A., of Derby. It is among the best of its kind and has become very popular. It is now in its fourth edition. It is published by Mr. J. Harwood, Derwent Street, Derby.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—There was a large attendance, including the Revs. J. M. Craven, C. E. Reed, and J. Ellis, at the Annual Congregational Service, when a presentation was made to the Rev. and Mrs. Hawthorn Jones on the occasion of their recent marriage. Mr. and Mrs. Jones suitably acknowledged the gifts.

Belfast, the First Church.—At the beginning of the winter a representative meeting of the ladies of the congregation was held to devise a scheme of work to render assistance to special war objects. As a result of various suggestions the scheme decided upon assumed a three-fold character:—1. To raise money for the Red Cross Society by means of monthly collections taken at the door of the church after service; to arrange for six monthly efforts of a varied character, the proceeds of which should be given to the St. Dunstan's Hostel for Soldiers and Sailors blinded in the war, this particular object making a special appeal to the congregation because of the fact that one of its members, Capt. Gerald Lowry, had been totally blinded in action in France; to form a Monthly Circle, the members thereof subscribing a minimum sum of 1*s.* per month. 2. To encourage forms of personal service, such as the visiting of soldiers' dependents, care for the wounded, correspondence with prisoners, &c. 3. To enlist the co-operation of ladies in the congregation for the making of woollen and other articles for soldiers and sailors. An Executive Ladies' Committee was formed, and has met frequently during the winter to systematise and supervise the work, while a Committee of twelve ladies has directed the six monthly efforts, for each of which two of the ladies were respectively responsible. These monthly efforts were brought to a conclusion recently by a very successful Cake Fair and Sale, which realised the sum of £111 7*s.* As the preceding five monthly efforts were also highly successful the total realised by all six is £478 18*s.* 3*d.* So large a sum could not have been achieved without generous assistance from friends outside the congregation, and, indeed, outside our religious community altogether. Thus, both the Lady Mayoress and the ex-Lady Mayoress of Belfast have not only been present at several of the monthly entertainments, but have both performed various public functions in connection therewith. A special resolution was passed by the Blinded Soldiers' Care Committee in London, presided over by Mr. C. Arthur Pearson, thanking the congregation for its thoughtful and generous help in aid of those who have made so great a sacrifice for their country. As regards the collections for the Red Cross Society these have been supplemented by means of a collecting-box permanently placed in the vestibule of the church. Since October the sum of £35 10*s.* 3*d.* has been realised for Red Cross purposes, and this branch of the work is being continued. The Monthly Circle, helped by generous donations, has provided an equally large amount of money for the purchase of materials, the Committee in charge undertaking to provide the latter where desired. Already some seven or eight hundred articles have been forwarded at frequent intervals to soldiers and sailors in need. Such dispatching of articles is being continued during the spring and summer, as the ladies concerned have unanimously decided to make no interruption to their labours for the brave men in our army and navy. It should also be mentioned that the Dorcas Society, a permanent institution of the church, has further been responsible for several hundred articles.

Brighton.—The Rev. Priestley Prime has resigned the post of minister of Christ Church, New Road, and the pulpit will become vacant at the end of June next.

Bury.—By the death of Mr. William Stephenson, Bank Street Chapel loses one of the most loyal and devoted workers the Sunday School has ever had. Mr. Stephenson joined the young men's class about the year 1855, and very soon gave proof of his eagerness to serve in any capacity in which he might be of use. He was appointed on several committees for special purposes, and for many years was a teacher in the school, as well as a member of the chapel choir. He acted for a short time as one of the superintendents of the branch school at Heap Bridge. The Christmas drama, so long a prominent feature at Bank Street, enlisted his interest from the first, and he appeared in it as recently as Christmas, 1912. From the year 1870 to the time of his death he acted as one of the superintendents of the Sunday School, and during that long period (forty-six years), he was never absent from chapel, Sunday School, or Committee, without reasonable cause. His colleague for thirty-seven years was the late Mr. Thomas Holt. A large-hearted, broad-minded, and optimistic man, Mr. Stephenson took a fatherly interest in the boys attending the school, and had a cheery word for every one.

Horsham.—The Rev. N. J. Hawthorn Jones has received and accepted an invitation to the ministry at the Free Christian Church.

London (Hackney).—On Tuesday, March 28, in spite of the blizzard, an audience gathered to listen to an interesting and instructive lantern lecture on "Mines, Submarines, and Torpedoes," given by Mr. P. L. Mallett, of the Navy League. Questions were asked at the close, and a collection was taken on behalf of the Navy League Fund for providing comforts for the men of the Navy. Mr. Hector Morison, M.P., announced to take the Chair, was unable to be present owing to national work.

Sheffield (Attercliffe).—We regret to announce the death of Mr. Reuben Jones, who for many years was actively identified with the Unitarian cause in Attercliffe, being one of its founders and Chairman of Committee till he left Sheffield. His life and work will always remain a gracious memory with the members of the Attercliffe congregation.

Tenterden.—The services on Sunday were in the nature of memorial Services for the Rev. Stopford Brooke. In the morning Mr. Rylett read Mr. Brooke's sermon on 'What is the Life of Man' from 'The Gospel of Joy,' and in the evening spoke of Mr. Brooke's career as poet, preacher, and man of letters, and bore testimony to the helpfulness of his life. At both services hymns written by Mr. Brooke were sung: 'It fell upon a summer day' and 'Oft, as we run the weary way.'

Yorkshire Unitarian Union.—A Conference under the auspices of the Union was held at Huddersfield last Saturday, the arrangements having been made by the Rev. R. A. Dickson and the members of the Fitzwilliam Street Church. About ninety friends from kindred churches in the surrounding district were present, including representatives from Halifax, Bradford (Chapel Lane, Broadway, and Idle), Pudsey, Leeds (Mill Hill and Hunslot), Dewsbury, and Lydgate. After tea a social hour was pleasantly spent listening to songs and 'cello selections rendered by friends from Bradford, Lydgate, Dewsbury, and Huddersfield. The Conference followed, and the Rev. W. Jellie of Southport read an excellent paper on "The Good and Evil of Denominations," which was received with hearty applause. The Revs. W. L. Schroeder, M. Evans, T. Paxton, J. S. Mathers, and others spoke in appreciative terms of the paper, and supported a vote of thanks to the reader. The Rev. W. R. Shanks referred to the successful character of the meeting, and on behalf of the Union, thanked the friends of the Fitzwilliam Street Church, and particularly its minister, for the successful arrangements which had resulted in one of the best Conferences that had been held during recent years.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THE Church collections have become a very important item in the support of our Belgian Hospital Fund, as a perusal of the weekly list of donations will show, and we are glad to say that we are by no means at the end of our resources in this direction. We have heard this week of two important churches which have fixed collections for an early date. On Sunday the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity at Newcastle-on-Tyne will celebrate its anniversary by handing over its annual collections to the Fund. Among the places where special sermons or addresses have been given are London—Hampstead, Highgate, Essex Church, Wandsworth, Kentish Town, Mansford Street, and Ilford; Liverpool, Manchester, Stockport, Monton, Warrington, Gee Cross, Southport, Leeds, Hull, Birmingham, Dudley, Nottingham, Norwich, Brighton, Hastings, Maidstone, Northiam, Halstead, Swansea, Cardiff, Llandyssul, Aberdare, and Belfast. In many other places steady work is going on every week, and the keenest interest is taken in all the activities of the Fund.

THIS is as it should be, only it is a great deal better than at one time we had dared to hope, for the appeals for help are so numerous. But this is our own work, and there has grown up among us a sense of common responsibility for it and a widespread interest in its success. One most cheering feature is that this interest shows no symptoms of decline. We have never had to besiege our supporters with urgent letters for money—a word in our columns has been enough, and week by week the parcels from working-parties and private donors come crowding into Mrs. Allen's house. Indeed, it is the steadiness of the effort, the resolve on the part of hundreds of people that nothing shall be lacking to make our offering as beautiful and efficient as possible, which has given a special quality to the work. It is an act of religion. It will deepen the power of religion in our own souls. It will also make the religious bond of common faith and charity, which unites the churches, stronger than before.

THE past week has brought us excellent news from France, though we fear that the English press, preoccupied with other and more domestic concerns, has given it less attention than it deserves. We are an insular people, and Zeppelin raids and the destruction of one air-ship by our guns seem to us more important than the splendid vigour and resource of the French resistance at Verdun. But the chief event of the week has been the Conference of the Allies at Paris. No doubt military plans of far-reaching importance were discussed and ratified, and we shall see the value of these agreements in the greater efficiency of the summer campaign. But behind them is the force of common trust and friendship which is of vast significance for the future welfare of the world. There is actually in existence at the present moment, amid all the horrors of war, a closer spiritual union among the great nations of the earth than has ever been known before. The presence of Japan at the Conference may also be taken as a symbol of the decay of the merely European temper and outlook, which still impoverishes so much of our political thinking, and the acceptance of a point of view which is not only larger in its sympathies but in every way truer to the facts of the modern world.

MR. ASQUITH'S visit to Rome has been a brilliant success. It has thrown up into bold relief the strength of the ties which unite us to Italy, ties not only of ancestral friendship, but of common devotion to the cause of justice and national freedom, for which true men will always be ready to sacrifice their lives. This was the prevailing note in the grave eloquence of Mr. Asquith's speeches, which seem to have made a deep impression upon a people singularly open to the power of noble oratory. We quote one notable passage:—

> Widely apart as the paths of development of our two countries have lain from many points of view, nevertheless, the national life of our peoples is to a great extent fed from the same sources and animated by the same spirit. Hatred of tyranny, love of justice, passion for liberty, the feeling that all citizens are equal before the law, liberty of thought and speech, these are the ideas which have been established as political principles and applied with equal fervour and conviction in Great Britain and Italy,

It is not in the least surprising that the years which have elapsed since your unity was finally accomplished have been years of continuous friendship between the two nations, a friendship which no misunderstanding and no incident could endanger for a single moment.

Mr. Asquith was evidently deeply moved as he realised that for the first time a British Prime Minister was being received by the first citizen of Rome in the Capitol, "which was the citadel and temple of the ancient world, the outpost of the world in the Middle Ages, and which to-day has become the symbolic monument of the renaissance and unity of Italy." It is no wonder that a deep sense of the immeasurable debt of the civilised world to Roman law and equity glowed through his words, as he paid his tribute to the past and affirmed his hope for the future.

I come [he said] to our friends in Italy to assure them of the solidarity existing among all the Allies, to reaffirm our unshakable faith in the cause of liberty and justice which we are defending, and to proclaim our irrevocable decision to protect the rights of weaker nations, and not to tolerate the violation of those elementary social laws which have been established by the efforts and struggles of centuries. In no other place in the world could my message be delivered more solemnly than here in the Capitol of Rome, the centre and source of so many of those great ideas which have guided and dominated the West up to our time. From the civilising genius of Rome, the founder of the European State, the law of nations was derived—that law which, ripening and developing throughout the long travail of years, triumphs over barbaric instincts and customs, and to-day is loyally accepted and observed by nations of every race and origin, with infinite advantage to the universe. What place more appropriate than Rome, witness of the most grandiose movements of the world, what place more appropriate to re-affirm the sacredness of the common law of Europe, that law which, having outlived the ancient Roman state, has become the universal heritage of man? I, who during my life have seen this venerable city again take its place at the head of a great and progressive nation, am glad at this grave moment Rome has again raised her strong voice, as she raised it last May, to denounce the systematic violation of that humane and beneficent code which was first formulated under the protection of her arm.

We suppose that everybody in the country has been thinking about money this week. The Budget hits us all—that is one of its chief merits, and it hits some of us pretty hard. But there has been very little grumbling. Of course, we know that grumbling would be useless, but the strange thing is that most of us do not want to grumble. That is a measure of the change that has come over us, and it is a change very much for the better. Even people who never thought about the deeper implications of social life before, and the foundations upon which civilisation is built, have come to see quite plainly that there are things which matter more than money and comfort and worldly place and power. That is a moral triumph for the greatest commercial people in the world, among whom the love of money and pride in its possession had grown enormously in recent years. We don't want to gain the whole world and lose our own souls, that is the plain lesson of it all. Of course, most of us hardly realise what it is going to mean for us in the coming years in the way of more straitened means, with fewer possessions, and less expensive amusements and a sparer habit of living all round. But we have confidence that the moral principle of the country will be able to stand the strain with vigour and cheerfulness. Some of us are even optimists enough to believe that life would certainly lose nothing of real value, and perhaps even gain in happiness, if we were forced to return to the more economical habits of our childhood.

It is likely that some of the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be subjected to sharp criticism, not so much because they offend vested interests but on account of financial expediency. It is undoubtedly a sound principle that in normal times taxation should not be petty and vexatious, and public inconvenience must be balanced by substantial financial advantage. From this point of view some of the new taxes may be open to debate. But we are by no means convinced that it is desirable to be very tender to these considerations of personal taste and convenience in the middle of a great war. Within proper limits taxation may be regarded now as a form of moral discipline, which forces the nation's peril and his own duty upon the attention of every citizen. It is well that when the smoker lights his pipe he should be reminded that wastefulness even in little things is a social crime, and that all of us when we go on a journey should pay more for it, or as an alternative, ask ourselves whether it is desirable that we should go at all.

There have been several warnings lately about the danger to the nation from the falling birth-rate. Our large armies on foreign service have brought us face to face with "the lowest birth-rate recorded in any quarter since the establishment of civil registration." But an equally alarming fact, and one for which it is far easier to find a remedy, is the increase in infantile mortality since the beginning of the war. In 1915, 110 children under one year died for every 1,000 births in England and Wales. In 1914 the rate was 105 children per 1,000 births. Saving the children is national service quite as much as nursing the wounded in hospital. There must be a large number of women in the country who have the time and ability to throw themselves into this work, which is both physical and moral. It is not one of the after-war problems which can wait while we attend to more urgent matters. It is a problem of the present moment, and we in our highly favoured position are the one country, among all the belligerents, which will be without excuse if we neglect it.

Sir Thomas Whitaker, the well-known temperance reformer, is doing a great deal to bring forward the proposal for State purchase as the best practical solution of the drink problem. In a recent speech he stated that a short time ago "the trade" could have been bought out on exceptionally reasonable terms. The members of a committee appointed to consider the question reported unanimously in favour of State purchase, but political, Parliamentary, and financial considerations stood in the way. The idea, however, had taken root, and it was now regarded in many quarters as the most promising solution of a long-standing and most difficult social and national problem. Sir Thomas Whitaker expressed the opinion that in the event of purchase one-third of the public-houses, and one half to three-fourths of the breweries would be closed.

We are likely to hear a good deal about Shakespeare's patriotism in the next few weeks, and probably his admirers in Germany will prove to their own satisfaction that he did not care for England and had a German soul! In an address to the Ancoats Brotherhood last Sunday Sir Frederick Pollock waived such suggestions aside with a pointed irony which was probably meant for some people nearer home. Someone, he suggested, might ask if Shakespeare thought that England was worth fighting for. Apart from such splendid passages as John o' Gaunt uttered in "Richard II.," the answer was written all over his work. "Besides," he added, "there are some questions really too impertinent to be put to any honest English gentleman, even when he is dead and immortalised these three hundred years."

THE REALITY OF EVIL.

Our object in putting pen to paper this week is not to express or promote any opinions of our own so much as to call attention to the article by the Editor in the current number of The Hibbert Journal, and to urge our readers to ponder it and to open their hearts to its challenge. It is clear and strong, but it is terrible as well, and for this reason many people will be inclined to dismiss it as too highly coloured and to persuade themselves that its scathing indictment cannot be true. The title which has been chosen for it, 'An Interim Religion,' hardly indicates its purpose, which is to lay bare the reality of evil and to summon every true son of God to truceless combat with it. It also makes it clear that the weapons of this combat are not argument and quiet words but action and our own flesh and blood. With a plainness of speech which leaves no possibility of doubt about his meaning, Dr. Jacks asserts that our country and our Allies are summoned at the present moment to no ordinary conflict, but to "the strife of God which passeth understanding."

> By the action of our apponents [he says] this conflict has been raised for us to the highest level. Not by making war—which in the abstract is no crime—but by the aim and method of their warfare they have identified their cause with naked evil, thereby giving the war such a character that all who oppose them become, in the act, defenders of the Right.

In the first days and weeks this truth had hardly dawned upon sensitive religious minds. Feeling that the war was just and unavoidable they were not happy about it. As Dr. Jacks observes, "Only a people which, having lost its self-respect, had grown incapable of respecting others could have penetrated the aims of Germany offhand." Our doubts and hesitations might have endured, and they might have deprived the combat of some of its moral passion and a complete union of hearts, if Germany had not herself ruthlessly torn the veil from our eyes, and made us believe that she is indeed in her present mood the enemy of mankind. We know now that we are at war with naked evil, and to fight evil of this kind until it is vanquished is the only course open to us. On this subject Dr. Jacks writes with a refreshing candour in which he does violence to a good deal of current sentimentalism in loyalty to moral facts. We have never seen the case for resistance stated with greater clearness and precision than in the following passage :—

> Not all the forces of the world are man's coadjutors or his fellows : one of them is his opposite and enemy, and it is precisely in exercising resistance to its opposition that man comes most fully to himself. By the innermost definition of his nature he is a fighter against evil. I say a fighter, and mean it literally. With naked evil there is no other way. Reason and persuasion are out of the question, for the essence of evil is that it refuses to hear reason and cannot be reasoned with. He who thinks otherwise is in danger of missing his human vocation. By leaving things to right themselves, or by trusting to the power of persuasive words he may even betray the cause for which man came into the world.

But the writer of these uncompromising words is not a prophet of war, he is a preacher of peace. Once again, when we have obeyed the stern summons "which brings us face to face with the business for which man was created," when we have been purged and purified in the fires of conflict, the peace of God that passeth understanding may possess our souls ; but there is no reason to suppose that we can have even a glimmering of its meaning on any other terms.

> The religion of calmer times—the religion of love and peace—is not endangered by this temporary transformation into something of sterner quality. Rather will it be invigorated and revived ; it will be shorn of the empty verbalisms that obscure its essence ; it will return, enriched and ennobled, to every son of man who held not back when the call went forth to come to the help of the Lord against the mighty. There is a new wisdom growing in these Islands : not the wisdom which arises from union merely, for men may be united in evil as well as in good, but the wisdom which arises in union for the highest aims ; the wisdom born simultaneously in millions of hearts when a nation resolves to die rather than suffer the wrong to prevail. By this wisdom all our creeds and professions will hereafter be tested. The only people who will have a right in the coming years to preach the gospel of love and peace will be those who can give a good answer when the question is asked : "What were you doing in the Great Day ?"

With this noble passage, in which warning and hope are so closely mingled, we must end, though the temptation to quote more is hard to resist. It is needless for us to point out to those who have done us the honour to read what has been written in these columns week by week, for many months, that we agree with Dr. Jacks' reasoning and his statement of our duty on both moral and religious grounds. But it can never be superfluous to express our admiration and gratitude for an utterance which has braced us with its moral severity and penetration, and in doing so has added strength to our conviction that it is only as we pay the sacrificial price of active resistance to naked evil that we can be loyal to the just demands of the common life, and by defending goodness retain our faith in God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

HOME THOUGHTS FROM THE SEA.

Nobly nobly Cape St. Vincent to the North-west died away ;
Sunset ran, one glorious blood-red, reeking into Cadiz Bay ;
Bluish 'mid the burning water, full in face Trafalgar lay ;
In the dimmest North-east distance dawn'd Gibraltar grand and gray ;
"Here and here did England help me : how can I help England ?"—say,
Whoso turns as I, this evening, turn to God to praise and pray,
While Jove's planet rises yonder, silent over Africa.

Browning.

The effeminate clinging to life as such, as a general or abstract idea, is the effect of a highly civilised and artificial state of society. Men formerly plunged into all the vicissitudes and dangers of war or staked their all upon a single die, or some one passion, which if they could not have gratified, life became a burden to them—now our strongest passion is to think, our chief amusement is to read new plays, new poems, new novels, and this we may do at our leisure, in perfect security, ad infinitum. If we look into the old histories and romances, before the belles lettres neutralised human affairs and reduced passion to a state of mental equivocation, we find the heroes and heroines not setting their lives "at a pin's fee," but rather courting opportunities of throwing them away in very wantonness of spirit. They raise their fondness for some favourite pursuit to its height, to a pitch of madness, and think no price too dear to pay for its full gratification. Everything else is dross. They go to death as to a bridal bed, and sacrifice themselves or others without remorse at the shrine of love, of honour, of religion, or any other prevailing feeling....There is at least more of imagination in such a state of things, more vigour of feeling and promptitude to act, than in our lingering, languid, protracted attachment to life for its own poor sake....A life of action and danger moderates the dread of death. It not only gives us fortitude to bear pain, but teaches us at every step the precarious tenure on which we hold our present being....The most rational cure after all for the inordinate fear of death is to set a just value on life. If we merely wish to continue on the scene to indulge our headstrong humours and tormenting passions, we had better begone at once; and if we only cherish a fondness for existence according to the good we derive from it, the pang we feel at parting with it will not be very severe!

William Hazlitt.

Glory to God on high, and on earth peace, good will towards men. We praise thee, bless thee, we worship thee, we glorify thee, we give thanks to thee for thy great glory, O Lord God, heavenly King, God the Father Almighty.

O Lord, our Redeemer, one God and Father of all, have mercy upon us.

O Holy God, Holy and Mighty, Holy and Immortal, deliver us from evil, for thine is the power: Fill us with eternal life; Receive our prayer.

For thou only art the Lord: Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, be unto thee for ever and ever. Amen.

RECREATION HUTS FOR THE BELGIAN SOLDIERS.

As we have been asked to start a recreation hut in Calais for Belgian soldiers, we thought it a good opportunity to visit a convalescent camp in the West of France where some English girls of the First Aid Nursing Yeomanry have started one. We have been able to help them in their work down there in the hospital wards and had wanted to visit them for some time past to see the actual conditions. On my last journey, after visiting Havre and Rouen, we went on down to this place, and after a long railway journey reached the station for the camp at 5.30 one evening. Here we found an ambulance waiting, the driver of which readily agreed to take us back to the camp, which is 7 or 8 kilometres from the town.

We reached the camp in the dark and could see nothing but rain and mud. However, at the "Mess Anglaise" we found two English girls, both busy with the canteen. One of them was an old friend, and after talking to her in the kitchen for a time I strolled out into the recreation room. I saw the other English girl serving out coffee, &c., to the men, and she said afterwards she had a tremendous shock on looking round to see a stranger "with a real hat on" after seven months of soldiers only. They gave us the most warm welcome, and of course it was too late to see much that evening. I went up and down the room a little. It was crowded with men, convalescents all of them, with a "caporal" in charge to see that order was maintained, but the behaviour was excellent and his place a sinecure apparently. The hut had a counter at the end, behind which one of the English girls stood and gave out huge cups of coffee or tea at ½d. each, and cakes, biscuits, chocolate, coffee, writing paper, &c. She also had a store of games lent out on request, but the man applying had to leave his ticket of entrance to the hut as guarantee that the game should be returned safely. The hut was furnished with tables and benches and stools, and at the other end were two bagatelle tables, which were very popular, and I had a talk with some of the men playing. One was a lad of 18, who had been training as an officer when war broke out, but was too young for a commission, so he ran away and enlisted. He had spent several months of convalescence earlier in an English town where he attended university classes. He was then looking forward to returning to the Front, but one could not help hoping that his pale face and youthful appearance would make the doctors forbid it. Another boy had become nearly blind through exposure when driving a motor at the Front, and though he had been pronounced incurable, it was pathetic the way he asked us if we could not help him somehow to get back his eyesight. At the opposite end from the counter is a stage where later on a rehearsal was going on for a play to be produced in a week or two. We carried off the two canteen girls to dinner at the hotel near the station, and they returned to their quarters later by ambulance. The third English lady, a trained nurse, could not leave, as she had several bad cases.

The next morning we were up there again about 10 o'clock, and were taken to call formally on the Colonel, and then round the camp. The mud was truly awful, even in some of the huts, where there is no flooring, only earth. The wards, some of them, at least, were more comfortable, and the English nurse has accomplished wonders in the way of cleanliness, order and comfort in the wards she works in. I went over her stores with her and have promised to send a number of quite ordinary appliances which she needs but cannot get. Her work is difficult, as she is alone, and needs a great deal of tact. She speaks no French, but all the men understand her somehow. In one ward the men said, "It is Sister who has cured us." They were tuberculous patients who were distinctly getting better. In a small room by himself lay a lad of about twenty years, dying of a lingering disease, suffering greatly, though he managed to smile at his English nurse when she brought us in. It seemed so sad that this boy should be lying there quite alone, and it once more brought home to us what being in exile really means. It was a dreadful day, hailing, snowing, raining by turns, and the canteen hut seemed the only comfortable place. It is open in the morning from 10 o'clock, but drinks (coffee and tea) are not served till about 12.30, after the men's dinner. At 4 o'clock the hut is closed for about half an hour only to sweep and clean it down, and is then open till nearly 8 o'clock, when the work is over for the day. It is very heavy work, seven days a week with such long hours. This visit convinced me once again of the immense value such a canteen is to soldiers in camp.

We went straight on from here to Calais to discuss the plans of the proposed recreation hut there with our friends, the head chaplain of the district, M. Meulepas, M. Van Segvelt, and Dr and Madame Lageot, all of whom are keenly interested in the plan. The hut, as agreed upon between us, is to be about 130 feet long by 35 feet broad. It will have a very small chapel at one end, with a removable partition almost immediately in front of the altar, and on one side of this a vestry, and on the other a small room to be used as a library. At the opposite end in a corresponding position will be a stage, with a room on either side, one to be used for stage purposes, while the other will be probably used for the caretaker to sleep in. Half way down one side will be the counter, at which coffee, chocolate, tea, cakes, cigarettes, notepaper, and various useful odds and ends will be sold, and behind this will be a door leading to a "lean-to," which will be the kitchen. Here will be kept the stores and cups and plates, and there will be a large boiler to supply hot water for drinks and for washing up.

The whole hut will be convertible into a church by simply putting down the partition in front of the altar, and by putting up the partition in front of the stage, or it can be an entertainment hall by the reverse process. A piano will certainly be wanted, and I should be glad to hear of anyone who can spare one, especially if from the London district, so that it can b readily transported from Tilbury. We shall also want a gramophone and record, if possible, and any number of games, pictures, and periodicals. The main body of the hut will be furnished with tables and chairs, tables for writing on or at which to take refre hments, and small folding tables for games. The chaplains will undertake the supervision, and the idea is to make it as much like a club as possible, and to have as few regulations as is consistent with order. Experience in the other hut I described shows that the men respond at once to such influences, and show themselves to be worthy of confidence. I should very much like to have English ladies in charge of the counter, but they would have to be prepared for hard work and long hours, and to be able to pay their own board and lodging.

Our Sunday School children and the young people of our congregations are making an effort to pay for the cost of the hut—about £500, and there is no doubt they will do it. But there is also the equipment to be paid for, the tables, chairs and canteen requirements. I am sure that all that we expend on this hut will be more than repaid in the good it will do among the men, and the evil it will prevent. Many privates in the Belgian army are boys of good family, and gentle upbringing, to whom a place where they can occasionally read and write in peace is an untold boon. I often see some of these boys when they are in England for a few days' holiday, and they all tell the same tale of the great need for such huts or tents.

When I was in Calais I was approached about the possibility of our extending this work to the men at the Front. Through friends in the army I have good hopes we may be able to place tents in two places very close to the trenches. We are negotiating about it now with the authorities, and I think it will be possible to do it. There is already one tent doing this work for one of the divisions, and the immense good it has done has made other parts of the army very anxious to benefit in the same way.

THE "ROSE ALLEN" HOSPITAL.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The names mentioned by Mrs. Allen in her interesting and very practical article contained in your issue of March 25 are quite familiar to me, and, as it happens, I can bear personal testimony to the nature and scope of the good work done by the Colonies Scolaires Belges. I have seen the little folk promenading in different parts of the beautiful river and forest and plateau district indicated by Mrs. Allen, and have conversed with the teachers as to objects and needs. If a hospital is set up in ——, it would be found most central and accessible. Moreover, in all future chronicles of the little town the name British will be honourably recorded. Already two military hospitals have been established, and I had the fortune not long ago to be conducted over one, in which every patient was French. The "Rose Allen Hospital" for the needs of little ones who are "strangers" in France will serve as a further symbol of true "Internationalism."—Yours, &c.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT AND CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—The Military Service Act provides as follows:—"An application may be made at any time before the appointed date to the Local Tribunal established under this Act by or in respect of any man for the issue to him of a certificate of exemption from the provisions of this Act....(c) On the ground of ill-health or infirmity; or (d) On the ground of a conscientious objection to the undertaking of combatant service." This being the law those in ill-health and the conscientious objectors are in like positions, and both classes of appellants are entitled to respectful treatment when appearing before the Tribunals. What the Tribunals have to consider is whether the appellant is in ill-health or has a conscientious objection, not whether he ought to be ill or ought to have a conscience. Some members of the Tribunals seem to have forgotten that there are those among us to whom the Ten Commandments are Divine decrees. "Thou shalt not kill" is to them absolutely binding, and they would undoubtedly rather be shot than shoot. John Bright was of military age when the Crimean War was declared. To this war he was strongly opposed, and the time came when the late Lord Salisbury as Prime Minister declared that we were wrong in entering upon that war. Can any one picture John Bright being forced to become a soldier by a British Government? I cannot. It is unthinkable. If the conscientious objections of John Bright are rightly respected, why not those of the less gifted John Smith? In the present terrible war I feel persuaded that if John Bright were still with us he would have supported Britain in her resistance to the German violation of the neutrality of Belgium and Luxemburg. He would, I believe, have considered our intervention as an International duty of the most sacred kind.

It does not follow that those who for any reason cannot bring themselves to join the army or navy should not in other ways bear their share of the national burden; they may fairly be called upon to pay special taxes and support our cause in other ways against which there can be no possible conscientious objection. Parliament having recognised the right of the conscientious objector to relief from military service, the Government have taken a wise step in appointing a Committee, under the chairmanship of the Hon. T. H. W. Pelham, to consider what service of national importance other than military applicants for exemption may be called upon to undertake. The work of this Committee will be of great value to the Tribunals, as it will make clear to them that exemption from military service need not mean exemption from national service.—Yours, &c.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MRS. PRIESTLEY SMITH.

The death of Mrs. Priestley Smith in her 65th year, on the 24th ult., will be felt as a deep bereavement by the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, and by a wide circle of friends.

Her quiet Christian character was a beautiful example of the enduring and far-reaching power of a devout and sincere life lived in the lowly ways of duty and affection. She was of a modest and singularly unselfish nature that never sought the prominent places of leadership in great public enterprises, but made itself intimately felt in many fields of human interest and in the retired pathways of personal charity and beneficence. She was a devoted and regular worshipper at her Church, and an ardent and faithful worker in the Sunday School, and ministered successfully there as superintendent. She maintained a close and affectionate relationship with her old scholars and corresponded with many of them to the last. Their grateful sense of her gracious helpfulness was expressed in the inscription on one of the wreaths: "Beloved teacher, constant friend." To many hearts she communicated the strength and consolation of her own entire loyalty to him she loved to call the Master, and her clear undoubting faith in immortality and the communion of saints. Religion was to her no fitful or strained exaltation of passing moods but the quiet breathing of a pure soul to whom God was a constant and real presence. Many poor families regarded her as their guardian angel who led and kept them in the peace and security of the Christian life.

Her addresses to the Young Women's Afternoon Class, the supervision of which she undertook on the death of Mr. Tranter, were distinguished by the grace of an experienced wisdom and unaffected spirituality. She was a wide and discriminating reader and possessed of intellectual gifts revealed in her contributions to some of the discussions in our columns. Her brief memoir of Mr. Tranter, written with a rare dignity and fine sincerity of diction, is a worthy tribute to the life of a beloved missionary whose name is revered by all who knew him.

She bore her long illness with a touching fortitude and a sweetness of patience that made it a benediction to see her in her last days. Even in her final weakness her thoughts were of others, and directed to alleviate the sadness of those who comforted her dying hours. To her it was given to pass hence as seeing through the veil and as beholding things invisible. May her habitation be in Paradise, and may the Good Shepherd number her among the flock of his redeemed.

CHARLES ELLIOTT ST. JOHN.

In recent years, especially since the meeting of the International Congress at Boston, U.S.A., there has been more frequent and intimate intercourse than in earlier days between the Unitarians of America and England. The news of the death of the Rev. Charles E. St. John will awaken memories of a singularly interesting and inspiring personality. Quiet and modest in manner and speech, Mr. St. John had a soul that burned with a fine enthusiasm for all things good and true. The more you saw of him, you were the more deeply impressed by the richness of his mind and the fervour of his spirit. There was always sanity as well as vigour in his thought and work; and his immediate friends, no less than his congregation, felt that his influence was wholesome and uplifting. He combined the qualities of strength and tenderness which, when well-balanced, go to the making of a truly noble type of character.

Mr. St. John graduated at the University of Harvard, and in 1883 became the minister of the Unitarian Church at Northampton; in 1891 he removed to Pittsburg, where he remained until 1900, when he was appointed Secretary of the American Unitarian Association. In 1908 he returned to the regular ministry and settled at Philadelphia. For several years past his health had been far from robust, but his last illness was brief. He died on February 25 in his 59th year, leaving a widow and two sons to mourn his loss.

Dr. C. W. Wendte, who gave the address at the Memorial Service, spoke of the great services rendered to the Unitarian Churches in America by Mr. St. John. While Secretary of the Association he had proved a heroic and inspiring missionary as well as a capable organiser. The congregations whose minister he had been bore ready and grateful testimony to the power of his preaching and the beneficence of his life and work in the community. The keynote of his character as a man and a minister was his profound religiousness. His sermons were prepared with great care, and were models of forceful appeal and deep spirituality. A few special discourses are published in a small volume, to be obtained at Essex Hall, under the title of 'The Religion of the Dawn.'

We desire to join with our American brethren in expressing our sincere appreciation of the life and work of Mr. St. John, and our sorrow at his early death. There are many on this side of the Atlantic who will long remember his kindly welcome on the occasion of their visit to America. W. C. B.

PRINCIPAL JACKS ON 'THE MEMORY OF THE AGES.'

Preaching from the words, "But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father shall send in my name, he shall teach you all things and bring to remembrance all that I said unto you," at University Hall last Sunday morning, Dr. Jacks pointed out that a two-fold function was clearly assigned to the Holy Spirit: in the first place it was the teacher of all things, enlarging continually the range of our knowledge and the depth of our experience, and in the second place it reminded us continually of those things which we learnt and knew long ago, but which, perchance, we had forgotten. The second clause of the text touched upon a very important truth which men in all ages, and especially in modern times, tended to neglect and overlook, namely, that in spite of the desire to increase knowledge, the retention of what we have learnt already is just as important, and, in some spheres, much more important. A man or a community or an individual which was always learning something new, but at the same time forgetting what it had learnt in the past, would be making no real advance. The church should stand for a firm hold on the truth attained as well as for the advance of truth, and the ideal church would be the one whose hopes went furthest in the future and whose memory went furthest back into the past. It would be a progressive church, but it would also be an historic church. The Holy Spirit would show himself in it in two ways—by continually teaching it something new, and by bringing to its remembrance truths learnt in the most distant ages in the history of the world. Truth was only living truth when it was not detached from its roots in the past; on the other hand, the roots themselves would die if the tree ceased to bear fresh leaves each year.

In developing his subject Dr. Jacks drew a distinction between science and religion in regard to the proportion in which each relies upon the knowledge of the past. The scientific man was always out to make discoveries and to acquire new knowledge, though no one knew better than he that he would not be able to do that unless he remembered what his predecessors had done, and he need not plunge his memory into the dim and distant ages of the early race. With religion the proportions of learning and retaining were mixed in a very different, perhaps, one might say, an opposite way, for the mark of religion was the immense length of its memory. Unlike science, there was nothing about which religion was so eager as it was to go back to the first childish babblings of mankind. Religion was really the memory of the ages. It carried us back to the very morning of the world when the stars first sang together before God. It revived the first adoration of the untutored soul, and wakened the primitive wonder out of which all thought sprang. In religion the mind remembered its own beginnings, and man became as he was before the shades of the prison-house closed around him. That was the thought which Wordsworth uttered in his 'Ode to Immortality.' Not that the new knowledge was to be despised, or that a time would ever come when men might cease to learn; but advancing knowledge should not lose touch with that earliest vision of God whence the desire for knowledge and the resolve to know had come forth. Only the mind which loved knowledge, and possessed it in complete measure, could pay such a tribute to memory as Wordsworth had uttered in the closing lines of that noble poem.

At the conclusion of his sermon, Dr. Jacks said, "We are accustomed to say that the war is teaching us many new lessons. Would it not be truer to say that the war is reminding us of lessons learnt long ago, but forgotten? We knew long ago, did we not, that no nation is permitted by the eternal laws of God to enjoy great power, great wealth, great knowledge, great empire, great traditions, unless it can prove itself worthy to possess them. We knew long ago that no class, no group, no individual has the right to place self-interest above that of the State which gives him his rights and defends him in their possession. We knew long ago that the undisturbed enjoyment of creature comforts is a most base and corrupting ideal for any nation or for any man. Had not many of us forgotten these things? We knew that no man can truly and sincerely say there are things higher than life unless he is willing to give his life for those things when the cause demands it of him. I think we may rest assured that the teacher who is teaching us the great lessons of this war is the Holy Spirit, to whom we owe all the lessons our souls have ever learnt, and he is teaching us, as he always does, by bringing to our remembrance words that were spoken long ago."

SOCIAL PROBLEM STUDY IN LIVERPOOL.

THE HOPE STREET CHURCH CIRCLE.

This Circle has just concluded a very successful season, successful alike in having carried out an excellent programme, in the interest maintained, and in attendances. It seemed as if the Social Problem Circle had been deprived of its object in life when the war cloud overspread Europe. War was everything, and social problems were not being considered. So the half-session following the outbreak of war was abandoned. And then there seemed to be a feeling that, as nothing could be done with social reform until happier times come again, it would be as well to become educative, and help to formulate the right spirit and view about the war. Hence from January to March, 1915, the Circle considered the question, "How to make this the last war." Having done so well with this it was considered that a full season, October, 1915, to March, 1916, might be undertaken, and it was decided to tackle "The effects of the war upon Social and Economic Life" as a general subject. This was discussed in various aspects: The Government measures introduced during the war, their effect and tendency in matters social, industrial, and financial; the Liquor Traffic, at home and with our Allies; Commerce and Business during War Time, in which we had the benefit of hearing a member of the Chamber of Commerce; Financial and Economic Matters, a subject which seemed to open up a vista of dryness, but in reality became as entertaining as a fairy tale when put before us by a leading banker. Trades Unionism and Strikes, and the Industrial Position of Women as affected by the war, also came up for special consideration.

In the half session just completed the theme was "The Possibilities of Social Reconstruction after the War." This has been discussed under the following heads:—The true national ideal—is it Imperialism?—the line taken being that ideals are more than possessions, and people more than property; the sphere and function of the state in production, distribution, and taxation—with some regard to the invasion by the State of so many departments of national life; the wastage of child life, and the future of society; and the position of women in citizenship and industry. On the two last evenings there was a remarkable contrast of outlook and opinion. The subject of the workman and the control of industrial conditions—the future of trade unions—was fairly and ably discussed by the secretary of the National Guilds League, following which he gave a brilliant address on the idea of national ownership under Guild methods. On the closing evening the subject was, "The State and the Individual."

A more forward policy in making known the purposes of the Circle has brought in a large number of thoughtful people, who come from a wide area in and beyond the city to attend the meetings. Formerly only a small number attended, but now the attendance reaches 120 and 130, with an average of over one hundred. The meetings are entirely free and open, non-sectarian and non-political; the Circle is without membership, and has no constitution or rules. The procedure has settled into the following form: an address by an expert on a particular subject, or someone who takes a deep interest in it; then questions, followed by debate by members of the audience, closing with a brief reply from the principal speaker.

THE BELGIAN REFUGEES IN HOLLAND.

WORK BY THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

At the annual meeting of the Hampstead Branch of the Women's League, held at Rosslyn Hill Chapel on March 21, Miss May Mitchell, after the business was concluded, gave an account of the work organised by the Society of Friends whch is being done among the Belgian refugees in Holland. The Friends naturally prefer to devote themselves to helping the non-combatant victims of the war. In Holland they are endeavouring to mitigate to some extent the monotonous conditions which are almost unavoidable in the large refugee camps organised by the Dutch government. Miss Mitchell left England in September, 1915, to give her help in this work, and proceeded via Flushing, Rotterdam and Gouda to Uden, where there is a large camp holding about 5,000 refugees. The country is flat and open, and from a great distance there can be seen at night the glare of the lights from the long low wooden buildings where these war victims have found a refuge. The supreme authority in the camp is a Dutch colonel, much liked by all, and under him is the man who is the head of the works department, an important side of the camp life. At the Town Hall is the Registration Bureau, where news may sometimes be obtained of missing relatives. The camp is arranged in open boulevards and squares, surrounded on three sides by the barracks. Of these buildings, those providing sleeping accommodation are divided into cubicles, thus giving a certain amount of privacy to each family; the dining-halls hold a thousand people in each, and serve also as sitting rooms. Other buildings take the hospital, nurses' home, the schools, and the workshops. Here in one place clothes sent from distant parts of the world are distributed, and under-garments are made. There are also departments for sanitary work, road-making and carpentering. The carpenters are largely employed in constructing little wooden houses, all made in sections, which can be easily carried and quickly put together, so that, when the time comes for a return to Belgium, they may take the place of some of the ruined homes of former days. There are about 70 in use at the camp now. The workers from the Society of Friends had the use of the Concert Hall for their work-room for women. At one end was a portion curtained off and devoted to an infants' school, and in the rest of it were 110 women employed in different ways, the making of clothes, of carpets and rugs for sale, embroidered curtains, and also household equipment and bedding of all kinds in preparation for the future when they are back in Belgium. Every effort is made to occupy the minds as well as the hands, and so, by varying the work, make them forget to some extent, for a time, the terrible sufferings they have experienced. Under the conditions of camp life it is very difficult to maintain a good moral tone, and some of the refugees are of a very low class, but during the three months that Miss Mitchell was at Uden a great improvement could be seen in the women who attended at the work-rooms. In the evening recreation is provided in the way of evening classes, gymnasium for boys and men, play-rooms for girls, and, in music, choirs for children and men, so that the beautiful Belgian folk-songs are constantly heard in the camp. But of course the Belgians do not like the camp life, and a good many manage to find outside work either in Holland itself or in England, and so endeavour to put by a little money for the future. For many, however, there is little hope of anything else during the war, and this work of the Society of Friends will do much to render them fit, physically and morally, when the time comes to take up the work of re-constructing their devastated country.

THE HURST STREET DOMESTIC MISSION, BIRMINGHAM.

The Annual Meeting of the Hurst Street Domestic Mission was held on March 27, the Lord Mayor of Birmingham, Alderman Neville Chamberlain, presiding. The Report of the Committee stated that useful and active work had been accomplished during the year, and an appeal was made for continued financial support in order that the work among the poor of the district might be continued. The total deficit amounted to £414. The Missionary, the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, pointed out in his report that the first year of a new ministry at an institution like Hurst Street Mission, and in succession to such a man as the late Mr. W. J. Clarke, would have been a trying period under any circumstances; but the war had, of course, increased the difficulties, and the attendances had suffered as a result of it. The character of the work had somewhat changed within the last fifteen years, as much of the relief work formerly carried out by the Mission had been transferred to public agencies, or rendered unnecessary by social legislation, and the Missionary was more free than formerly to concentrate on the higher work of developing a sense of spiritual fellowship among the poor. The Sunday morning meeting had taken on a more educational and literary character, although the devotional part of the service was never omitted or slurred over, and there had been a decided improvement in the attendance. The P.S.A. had been run very much on the same lines. The Sunday School was doing good work, although it had suffered from the loss of several teachers and scholars owing to the war, and the Soldiers' Gift Fund had accomplished a great deal in the way of sending parcels to members serving with the colours, besides enabling the Missionary to get into touch with these men, numbering nearly sixty, and so strengthen the bond between them and the Mission. The Band of Hope, Girls' Social Club, the Window Gardening Society, and other institutions connected with the Mission, had all been kept going, and a Musical Circle had been formed under the guidance of the organist and choirmaster, Mr. R. A. Clarke.

The Lord Mayor, in moving the adoption of the Reports and the statement of accounts, said, even in times like the present, when views were undergoing such extraordinary changes, there was still ample scope for a mission of that kind. At the beginning of the war a great many people—perhaps most people—expected that we were going to enter upon a period of great distress owing to unemployment. He was not one who took that view. Now we could certainly congratulate ourselves that so far from unemployment being more prevalent than usual, there had never been a time, so far as he could remember, when employment was so ample and wages so high. That had been some help and compensation for the anxieties and the sorrows which had entered many homes. But, however many people were able to earn their living, and to obtain wages which were sufficient to meet the increased cost of living, and, perhaps, leave something over, there would always be some left who would not be able to earn their living, like the old age pensioners, the infirm, and the sick. To those people a mission of that kind was able to extend a helping hand. Mr. Whiteman had stated that some of the work of the Mission had been rendered unnecessary by the growth of the social conscience. He meant by that there was an increasing sense among all classes of the community that they had, as well as their rights, certain duties towards one another. He (the Lord Mayor) thought Mr. Whiteman was right when he said that feeling was on the increase. He was sure it had increased very much during the past ten years; but he could not help thinking that during the war, and after it, there would be a still greater growth of the social conscience. The war had not taken its toll of victims from one class alone. Every class in the country had made sacrifices, and made them willingly, and would make even more if required until victory crowned our arms; but, in the meantime, those sacrifices had brought this consolation—that we had common interests, common ideals, and a common country, which we were all going to defend against a common enemy. It had brought us all nearer together, and, he thought, had made us feel that when the war was over those who had been out fighting our battles had earned something which it was our business to repay. To be a human being and an Englishman carried with it some sort of right. The war would bring home to us more than ever before that we must try and see that every man, woman, and child got a chance. If that happier state of things came about it would be almost worth having had to fight for it. Still, that would not supersede missions. On the contrary there would be more need than ever for the mission, as it was going to be the channel of communication between the different grades of society, and would serve to point the way to the fostering and preservation of that spirit of unity which the war had produced, and which, he hoped, would last long after the war was over.

Mr. Byng Kenrick seconded. A mission such as that represented, he said, the fulfilment necessary for all official and Government action. It conveyed the personal touch of voluntary service from man to man, which was the only thing that helped to weld the different classes into a brotherhood all striving for a common end.

A vote of thanks to the mission workers was moved by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who urged the importance of releasing the missionary, as far as possible, from mere routine work. He was glad Mr. Whiteman was an enthusiast for social righteousness and not a mere alms-giver; but he hoped he would remember that he stood for social sympathy rather than for social righteousness, as no social or political changes would do away with the need for that. From his report it was clear that he was conscious of this, and that he would keep that ideal in view.

The Rev. T. Graham, in seconding, mentioned the fact that Hurst Street Sunday School was a fully graded school, the only one in the Midland Union, which showed that they were wide awake to the needs of the time.

The Rev. Lawrence Clare, in moving the election of the Committee and officers, dealt with the various phases of mission work, all of which, rightly understood, were spiritual, even the ministry to material needs, which was a necessary condition of the success of the appeal to the higher nature. The Rev. Stanley Gibbon seconded the resolution.

Before the proceedings ended the Chairman, on behalf of the subscribers and friends, presented a cheque for £25 to Mrs. Chandler (formerly Miss Stevens), who for many years had been Secretary to the mission, on her retirement.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Blackfriars Mission was held at Stamford Street Chapel, London, on Monday, April 3. The chair was taken by Mr. C. F. Pearson. The reports of the committee and treasurer, which were presented by Messrs. A. A. Tayler and W. S. Tayler, recorded a satisfactory year of work, but the balance due to the treasurer has unfortunately increased during the year, and an urgent appeal is made for new subscriptions. The Minister's report was read by the Rev. W. J. Piggott, and showed that the various activities of the Mission had been maintained with success. It refers in particular to the excellent work done by the Boys' Own Brigade, whose members attend Church parade twice a month on Sunday morning. The Open-Air Mission for 1915 was also a great success, and with the help of the Revs. T. P. Spedding and J. A. Pearson, Mr. Ralph Sorensen, and other Pioneer Preachers, Mr. Piggott has spoken to large crowds who assembled at the special "pitch" at Webber Street in the New Cut. In spite of several difficulties the well-known Monday evening concerts have been steadily maintained, and a special tribute is paid to Mr. Ling for his work in this connection. The Children's Penny Bank, the Provident Bank for Adults, the Maternity and Medical Club, and the Provident branch of the Mother's Meeting have also had a successful year.

The adoption of the reports was moved by the Chairman, and seconded by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and the committee and officers for the ensuing year were elected on the motion of Mr. Percy Preston, seconded by Mr. Arnold Tayler. In moving a vote of thanks to Mr. Piggott and the workers at the Mission, the Rev. Basil Martin laid stress upon the great importance of spiritual work and the privilege of speaking about the great principles of religion to men at the present time. The motion was seconded by Mrs. Arnold Lupton. Dr. Walter Walsh, in supporting it, referred to Mr. Piggott as a good and honest man, and a man well worth supporting, who spends his life in going to the help of the weakest, and whose heart beats for the "underdog" in the fight. The meeting closed with a vote of cordial thanks to Mr. Pearson for taking the chair, moved by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

INAUGURAL MEETING.

The Inaugural Meeting of the East Lancashire Unitarian Association was held on Saturday, March 25, at Oxford Street Unitarian Church, Accrington. In spite of the weather there was a good attendance, representatives being present from all the affiliated churches—Accrington, Burnley Lane, Burnley (Trafalgar Street), Blackburn, Colne, Newchurch, Padiham, Nelson, and Rawtenstall. The service in the afternoon was conducted by the Rev. John Hinkins, the sermon being preached by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins from the words, "Endeavouring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." At the business meeting which followed the officers for the year were elected, and the rules of the association drawn up, the objects of the Association being defined as follows:—"(a) To strengthen the religious life of the affiliated churches and to develop mutual help between them; (b) To unite in missionary effort for the promotion of Unitarian Christianity in East Lancashire."

A public meeting was held in the evening, the first President, Mr. J. R. Cameron, in the chair. The Secretary explained how the idea of forming the Association had resulted from the deliberations of the Minister's Monthly Fraternal. Mr. Cameron pointed out that this was not the first time an attempt had been made to start an association; but the conditions were now more favourable, there being three more self-supporting congregations than formerly. The one thing in all the world that would unify men was the binding power of religion; but they must stand up for the faith that they held, and, amidst differences, exercise charity.

The Rev. H. Bodell Smith drew attention to the good which comes from ministers and laymen acting together. The world needed more church life; but the great demands of the church in the future would only be met by the faithfulness of the people.

Mr. T. W. Waddington (Padiham) spoke hopefully of the good results which the spirit of fraternity might accomplish. The devotional and meditative aspect of church life was, he thought, not properly understood; yet even if the sermon was unsuitable, it was valuable to find oneself publicly recognising the power of the unseen God. One of the results of Christian teaching had been that, amidst the horrors of war, men had risen above national limitations, and the Red Cross, hospitals, and works of mercy were all evidences of a wide brotherhood.

The Rev. William McMullan (Rawtenstall), after referring to the indisposition of the Rev. Thomas Munn, urged that the day of splendid isolation had passed, and that religion had a right to expect men to unite in good works. The church that pursued a lonely course generally suffered from enfeebled vitality; but the Association aimed at creating life in the nine churches, and one of the results of that fellowship would be an attempt to widen the circle of reason, devotion, and truth.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

Dr. L. P. Jacks paid one of his occasional visits to London last Sunday morning, when he preached at University Hall. He is announced to take the service there again next Sunday morning.

There will be widespread regret at the announcement that the Rev. Dendy Agate will retire from the ministry of Dunham Road Chapel, Altrincham, in September. Mr. Agate entered Manchester New College in 1868, and began his ministry in 1875. He has been at Altrincham since 1898. He will carry the good wishes of a troop of friends into his retirement, and gratitude for a ministry which has been rich in kindness and human sympathy.

Next Sunday, April 9, there will be a general exchange of pulpits in the churches of our fellowship in London. The arrangements have been in the capable hands of the Rev. J. A. Pearson.

The interior of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, has been enriched recently by a chancel rail and choir stalls in oak, and new electroliers. They are the generous gift of Mr. Charles Hawksley in memory of the connection of his family with the congregation in former years.

No less than three of the men whose names occur on the Roll of Honour of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, were mentioned for conspicuous gallantry in the last dispatch sent by General French just before he relinquished the command in France. They are Major Hind, Captain and Adjutant Gotch, and Capt. Warren.

Our hearty congratulations to Lieut.-Col. C. F. T. Blyth of the 2nd London Divisional Train A.S.C. (T.F.), who has been appointed Companion of the Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George for services rendered in connection with military operations in the field. Col. Blyth is a member of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and was till recently one of the directors of The Inquirer.

A pleasant announcement appears in the Hope Street Church Calendar for April, which illustrates the growing fellowship in good work among all churches, to the effect that the Salvation Army made a retiring collection at the church on March 5 at both services.

A "Lang Buckland Mission to the Blind" has been organised by the members of Christ Church, Nottingham, as a memorial to their late minister. The President is Mr. J. C. Warren, Hon. Sec. of the Royal Midland Institute for the Blind.

Miss Francis writes from 128 Broadwall, London, S.E.—"The National Conference Guilds' Union will hold its Annual Meeting at Stamford Street Chapel, S.E., on Easter Monday, April 24. If any of your London readers could offer hospitality to delegates from the provinces attending this meeting I should be glad if they would communicate with me at the above address."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Halstead.—The annual meeting was held in the Free Christian Church on Sunday, March 26, after the service, Mr. Slater being in the chair. There was a good attendance, though the average at the services has not been quite so good as last year. This is partly attributed to the dark streets, and the fact that some of the old members have left the town. Four new subscribing members, however, were enrolled at the close of the meeting.

Horsham.—The Rev. N. J. Hawthorn Jones of Ashton-under-Lyne has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the Free Christian Church, Horsham.

Hull.—On Sunday evening, March 26, Mrs. Bernard Allen spoke to a large congregation on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund in the Park Street Chapel. The Rev. T. M. Falconer conducted the service. The collection on behalf of the Fund amounted to £23.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—The pulpit was occupied on Sunday last by the Rev. F. K. Freeston. At the close of a sermon on 'Christianity and Culture,' the preacher said that, if he wanted a crowning illustration of the Christian culture for which he had been pleading, he found it in the late Mr. Stopford Brooke, whose hymns ("When the Lord of Love was here' and 'Come, Thou Source of sweetest gladness') they had been singing that morning. Most of them had heard him preach from that pulpit; some of them had known him in life, and had looked into his noble face, aflame with passionate indignation against wrong; they had read his published sermons, with their exultant and optimistic titles; and they remembered how, at the call of conscience, he seceded from the Established Church, and how, after that sacrifice, Jesus became more to him, and not less. Here was culture at its best; here was Christianity truly, an inspiring and ennobling personality. Let them try to be more worthy of him, of this preacher of a living Christianity, of the happy warrior in the battle against evil; this noble soul with the vision passionate, offering understanding that there might come fruit of it into their lives.

London: Islington.—On April 4, a lecture was given (under the auspices of the Unity Women's League) by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, entitled "Behind the Firing Line in France." The lecturer, who based many of his remarks upon his own observations, dwelt more on the noble work that is being carried on away from the trenches than on the horrors of the war, and paid a high tribute to the cheerful endurance and heroic endeavour that is evident, in all classes of society, in France.

London: Women's Social Club.—The seventh annual Girls' Drill Competition and Display took place on Saturday, April 1, at Caxton Hall, before a crowded audience. Miss Tollemache, member of the Board of Examiners of the British College of Physical Education, acted as adjudicator, and Lady Durning-Lawrence occupied the chair. The growing interest in the Competition was shown by the entry of new teams from Brixton, Stratford, Forest Gate and Walthamstow. The contest was as usual a keen one. In the Senior Competition, the Portland Institute team won the Shield, and Essex Church the second prize, just reversing last year's places. Then followed Unity Club, Kilburn, Mansford Street, Bell Street, and Forest Gate and Walthamstow—the latter unavoidably last, being an incomplete team, owing to the recent loss of four members through extra work. The Junior Shield was carried off by Essex Church, and the second prize by Mansford Street, Brixton coming third; Durning Hall, Limehouse, fourth; Bell Street, fifth; and Stratford, sixth. The display items of the various teams—figure marching, dumb bell and wand exercises, skipping, and several fancy dances—gave variety to the programme, and were much enjoyed by the audience.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Sunday School Anniversary was held on Sunday, April 2, addresses being given by the minister, the Rev. A. Scruton, and Miss Clephan, President of the Sunday School Association. Miss Clephan had previously inspected the school and met the teachers in a Conference, and her visit was much appreciated.

Wallasey.—The Memorial Church Red Cross Workers are doing good work. Meetings are held every week, and Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Johnson are acting as collectors of weekly sums ranging from a penny upwards. The amount collected in the month of February for the Belgian Hospitals was £4 7*s.* 2*d.*, bringing the total up to £45 7*s.* 8*d.* The Rev. A. E. and Mrs. Parry are entering upon their sixteenth year of ministry in Wallasey, and April 8 will be the twenty-eighth anniversary of the beginning of the movement at the Albert Hall, New Brighton, to establish the congregation.

THE MOTHER AND THE SONS.

Where, where are your soldier lads, Mother of Nations, say,
Mother of lads in the isles at home, in the new lands far away?
"Out in the fields, the hills, the sands, holding the leagues of line,
And braving the face of War for me, are the soldier lads of mine."

Sing, sing to your soldier lads, Mother of Shakespeare, sing,
Songs of the woods and the lanes they love when the birds are gay in spring;
Tell of the feet that will wait for theirs, down where the blue-bells grow,
And the eyes that shine for the soldier lads wherever the soldiers go!

True, true to your soldier lads, Mother at home, be true;
Honour and faith, through all the world, look up to your lads and you;
Hushed be the base and craven tongue, crushed be the traitor knave—
There's room in the realm for no one now but the straight, and stanch, and brave.

Brave lads are your soldier lads, Mother of Nations free,
Give them a stainless flag to bear, wherever their march may be;
Give them a charge, a hope—a prayer—O Mother of mortal men,
Till the day comes round to welcome them, and the lads are home again!

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

A PLEASANT tribute to the value of our Belgian Hospital work has come to us this week from the firing line. It is contained in the letter of a chaplain, an aged priest, who has done magnificent work among the soldiers in the trenches from the beginning of the war, reckless of all danger to himself. "Yesterday," he writes, "M. —— came to see me in the trenches, where I am now nearly always. He tells me your Fund is perpetually extending its work. I congratulate both you and our soldiers. It deserves all success. I had some conversation with him about the tent, and he tells me he will explain the exact needs to Mr. Kelland, and has promised to push the matter forward as quickly as possible. A canteen has been established in a village some way off, and works admirably. Some of our men have been over to visit it, and found they could read and refresh themselves there, and they tell me what a boon it was to them."

"I AM writing," the letter continues, "nearer to the Germans than to our own soldiers. For many days I have been cut off from the civilised world. This morning we had a terrible bombardment, heaven and earth trembled. A few more metres and we should have been no more. But God watched over us. To get to this post we have to dodge between the bullets, and for days do not dare to show ourselves. Last night we had so many wounded whom I was able to tend, thanks to the remedies you sent me....I must not write about it, but you can guess. The sorrowful sights I have seen in the last few days! One must be so careful not to betray to the enemy where our battery is placed. If you only knew the scene I look upon at this moment!....At night time some one will take this letter for me when our men are relieved."

THE writer of this letter is well known to us personally. We are glad to be able to inform our readers that we have given the order for a tent to serve as a recreation room and canteen, and it will be sent out as soon as possible. With all the equipment it will cost about £300. This tent is in addition to the Hut at the base. It can be moved about with the army, and will be invaluable to the men when they are resting from their work in the trenches. At present they have nowhere to go, no quiet corner where they can read or write or enjoy a talk with a friend.

OUR good understanding with France has been strengthened by the official visit of French Senators and Deputies to this country. The ceremonial connected with it has been dignified and enthusiastic, and the tour of the munition factories must have opened the eyes of our guests to the tremendous volume of energy which we are putting into the common task. In the address of welcome to them delivered by the King at Buckingham Palace the removal of the menace of aggression which has long darkened the sky of Europe and threatened the prospects of peaceful progress all over the world was stated to be our common aim in the war.

The alliance of the Powers that will accomplish this [His Majesty said] is based not only on the common interest which all of them, you and Russia and Italy and Japan, and those deeply injured countries, Belgium and Serbia and Montenegro, have equally with ourselves in putting an end to that menace, but also upon our devotion to the same ideals. Liberty and peace are the ideals to which your Republic has been devoted. Liberty and peace are the ideals of the British people also, wherever over the world it dwells. Here and in the Dominions and in the Colonies we desire these blessings for ourselves. We desire them for other nations also. We hold that in their diffusion everywhere lie the best hopes for the future of mankind, for liberty and for peace. We fight side by side with you in the belief, stronger now than it has ever been since the beginning of the war, and daily growing stronger, that victory will crown the cause of right.

IN his speech at the Government banquet to the French delegates on Monday the Prime Minister defined our objects in very similar terms, and in doing so made a most effective reply to the recent speech of the German Chancellor in the Reichstag. "Great Britain and France alike," he said, "entered the war not to strangle Germany, not to wipe her off the map of Europe, not to destroy or mutilate her national life, certainly not to interfere with—to use the Chancellor's language—'the free existence of her national endeavours,'

We were driven both here and in France to take up arms in order to prevent Germany (which for this purpose means Prussia) from establishing a position of military menace and dominance over her neighbours."

Mr. Asquith went on to give an important definition of our intentions and the conditions upon which the Allies will be willing to consider peace.

> As a result of the war [he said] we intend to establish the principle that international problems must be handled by free negotiation on equal terms between free peoples, and that this settlement shall no longer be hampered and swayed by the overmastering dictation of a Government controlled by a military caste. That is what I mean by the destruction of the military domination of Prussia; nothing more, nothing less. There is another aspect of the war to which we have from the beginning attached the utmost importance....We are in this struggle the champions not only of treaty rights, but also of the independent status and free development of the weaker countries.

These terms are in one sense purposely vague. They do not discuss territorial arrangements or the fate of the German Colonies or a hundred other questions which will require the utmost skill in practical statesmanship at the proper time; but to do so at the present moment would be to confuse the issue and to divert attention to matters of secondary importance before the primary object has been attained. This is just what wise men must steadily refuse to do. We may, indeed, measure to some extent the strength of their devotion to liberty and peace and the idea of a community of free nations by their resolution to have nothing to do with a premature settlement, which might secure a little less suffering for the present generation at the price of a base betrayal of the future.

Wittenberg, with its memories of the Reformation and the tombs of Luther and Melanchthon in the Schlosskirche, has been one of the sacred spots in Germany which has almost rivalled Weimar as a place of international pilgrimage. Suddenly it has been degraded in the eyes of the world, and we shall be forced to associate it with things which are hideous, unclean, and inhuman. The story of its typhus-stricken camp, where prisoners of war were left to die in indescribable foulness and misery, is one of the vilest which even this war has produced We do not care to dwell upon the cowardice of the German doctors and military guards. To such men no infamy is impossible and no punishment could be too severe. If our words are few, anger is hot within us, and a picture has been branded upon our memories which we shall never forget.

But once again the fine English spirit has risen, bright and undaunted, above the most hideous difficulties. Let us place the names of the six English doctors along with that of Nurse Cavell among the heroes and martyrs who make us humbly thank God that the same blood flows in our veins. Major Fry, Major Priestley, Capt. Sutcliffe, Capt. Field, Capt. Vidal, and Capt. Lauder were sent by the German authorities to the pestilential camp to take the place of the German doctors who had quitted their posts. They did their duty. That simple phrase conveys more than any attempt to describe their work. Three of them died of typhus; Major Priestley, Capt. Vidal, and Capt. Lauder have survived and have been allowed to return home. With them must be associated the orderlies among the prisoners who volunteered for hospital work, knowing well the terrible risks which they ran. Like true Englishmen they were brave and compassionate, and they, too, did their duty. No words are needed to adorn a deed so splendid.

We called attention to the problem of infant mortality last week, and we are glad to see that there has been a good deal of public discussion of the subject. Far more of our children could be saved if we had the will and the intelligence to save them. It is, moreover, a matter that need not wait upon legislation or better social machinery; for a great deal can be done by personal service in removing ignorance and encouraging better parental care. The failure of machinery, apart from this element of personal sympathy and reverence for motherhood, is illustrated by Germany. We are often told that they do these things much better there, with their passion for organisation and their reliance upon logical schemes. We believe, however, that it is a fact that in spite of some clumsiness in our methods we have been more successful in fighting infant mortality than Germany. From 1901 to 1912 the figures for Germany were 184 per 1,000, and for the United Kingdom during the same period 121 per 1,000. In addition to this Berlin has the largest illegitimate birth-rate in the world, a sinister fact which probably has a close connection with the high average of mortality.

But the discussion of this problem as it affects the whole field of vital statistics and our power of recuperation after the war, leads to another, namely, the distribution of the birth-rate over different grades of society. There can be no doubt that luxurious habits tend to make children an encumbrance. English middle-class life, in its effort to have a good time, has often forgotten its debt to the future, and motors, sport, and expensive holidays have been preferred to babies. Or a mistaken sense of duty to one or two children has taken the place of parental affection for a family of four or five. The expensive public school and three or four luxurious years at Oxford or Cambridge have become the standard in many circles in which formerly large families were well educated and trained for the work of life without expensiveness. This is a matter which we shall have to face with a great deal of good sense, for the temptation after the war will be to make lowered means adequate for the old scale of living, and therefore still further to reduce the amount which we spend on the training of the next generation. We cannot repair the ravages of the war unless we are determined to substitute the ideal of sacrifice for the future for devotion to our own pleasure and social position. Children must be more important in our eyes than an opulent scale of living.

We regret to notice the death of Mr. Wilfrid Ward, who was not only a literary man of some eminence but also a prominent interpreter of Roman Catholic thought and life to the educated English mind. His name carries us back to the great figures of the Oxford Movement, for he was the son of "Ideal" Ward, the friend of Keble and Newman. In the quality of his own thought he always showed certain characteristically English traits, especially in his literary tastes, which marked him off from the vigorous and uncompromising Ultramontanism of Wiseman and Manning. His chosen field was biography. His two books on his father, 'William George Ward and the Oxford Movement,' and 'William George Ward and the Catholic Revival,' the two volumes on Cardinal Wiseman, and his great life of Newman, are indispensable "sources" to the historian of religious thought in the nineteenth century, and those who turn to them for information will quickly fall under the spell of the author's literary power and his unusual skill in spiritual portraiture.

TWO IDEALS.

We have heard much lately of the opposition of two ideals which are now contending for the mastery of the world. Whether the Kingdom of God can ever be established by war is a question of very grave import, on which I will not now enter. The present war must some time cease, if not through the persuasion of political wisdom and Christian love, at least through exhaustion and despair. Then the conflict of the two ideals will enter the arena of rational discussion, and the united power of Christian faith in all lands will be required to secure the victory for the higher ideal. It is an age-long antagonism. When Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans, Christ and Nero were the two heads of the contending principles, and the power of the sword and the power of the Cross were engaged in a conflict which at the time could excite only a passing sneer in the minds of soldiers and statesmen, the rulers of this oppressed and sorrowful world.

More than thirty years ago Bishop Westcott, writing about these ancient times, declared that "the opposition of Christianity and Imperialism was complete and irrevocable. The two Empires, when regarded in their principles, were seen to be utterly irreconcilable." And still these two powers stand in deadly antagonism—the Cross and military Imperialism, the life of God in the surrendered soul of man and the life of brute force seeking to subject the world to its own selfish will; the beneficent love which would sacrifice itself in doing good and bringing blessings to friend and foe, and the ruthless ambition which would trample on friend and foe alike, and erect its arrogant throne on an enslaved and ruined world.

But let us not delude ourselves into a false security. For the moment it seems as if these two sides were represented in this horrible war. But I cannot believe that the mass of the German people have in their hearts accepted what I must call the satanic ideal; and in our own England it has too many advocates. Say what we will, war, though it may be forced upon us by the highest principles of honour, and though it calls for the exercise of a noble heroism and self-sacrifice, tends to drag us down morally, and to arouse feelings of hatred and vengeance; and it is not easy to maintain in our own bosoms the highest Christian principles in the midst of its barbarities. That ultimately Christ, and not Nero, is to be the Saviour of the world from its guilt and folly I have not the shadow of a doubt; but England, in order to be true to her high calling, must keep her eye fixed upon the glorious ideal, and never forget that "the kingdom of God is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit," and to God alone belong "the kingdom, the power, and the glory for ever and ever."

James Drummond.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

I cannot think that thou should'st pass away,
Whose life to mine is an eternal law,
A piece of nature that can have no flaw,
A new and certain sunrise every day;
But, if thou art to be another ray
About the Sun of Life, and art to live
Free from what part of thee was fugitive,
The debt of Love I will more fully pay,
Not downcast with the thought of thee
so high,
But rather raised to be a nobler man,
And more divine in my humanity,
As knowing that the waiting eyes which scan
My life are lighted by a purer being,
And ask high, calm-browed deeds, with it agreeing.

James Russell Lowell.

We have a God who is infinitely gracious, and knows all our wants. I always thought that He would reduce you to extremity. He will come in His own time, and when you least expect it. Hope in Him more than ever; thank Him with me for the favours He does you, particularly for the fortitude and patience which He gives you in your afflictions; it is a plain mark of the care He has for you; comfort yourself therefore with Him, and give thanks for all.

I admire also the fortitude and bravery of M. de ——. God has given him a good disposition, and a good will; but there is in him still a little of the world and a great deal of youth. I hope that the affliction, which God has sent him, will prove to him a wholesome medicine, and make him take stock of himself. It is an occasion very proper to engage him to put all his confidence in Him, Who accompanies him everywhere: let him think of Him the oftenest he can, especially in the greatest dangers.

A little lifting up of the heart suffices; a little remembrance of God, one act of inward worship, though upon a march and sword in hand, are prayers which, however short, are nevertheless very acceptable to God; and far from lessening a soldier's courage, they best serve to fortify it.

Let him think then of God the most he can. Let him accustom himself by degrees to this small but holy exercise; nobody perceives it, and nothing is easier than to repeat often in the day those little acts of inward worship. Recommend to him, if you please, that he think of God the most he can, in the manner here directed: it is very fit and most necessary for a soldier, who is daily exposed to dangers of life and often of his salvation.

From the Letters of Brother Lawrence.

We ask not of Thee, O Father, silver and gold, honour and glory, nor the pleasures of the world, but do Thou grant us grace to seek Thy kingdom and Thy righteousness, and do Thou add unto us things necessary for the body and for this life. Behold, O Lord, our desire; may it be pleasing in Thy sight. Amen.

VERSE.

SACRIFICES DUE.

To War, O friends who long for Peace with me,
Pay we the sacrifices due—no less,
No less. If to such rites thou grant success,
So be it, War; thy punctual flamens we,
Full-handed! Yield we, friends, soft luxury,
Home festals, e'en long cherished loveliness,
Nay, yield our lives, our lovers, and profess
Content, if only Europe may be free.

But ne'er to clamorous War may friend of mine
Weakly surrender aught of the one good
Worth dying for ; or in brute rage resign
One hope, one human aim, for which he stood ;
Or, blindly rash, forget the stars that shine
Stainless, for ever, o'er these fields of blood.

W. G. Tarrant.

A LETTER FROM DENMARK.

This is not the first letter I have written to the readers of The Inquirer, nor the second or third. I have written many—for my friends and fellow-believers across the North Sea are, in this dreadful crisis, in my thoughts almost every day, and I am longing to hold their hand in mine and communicate with them ; but —well, we have an old saying that runs : "Sleep upon it," which means that any decision of the least importance should have a night's as well as a day's consideration. You will ask me : what then have I written that needs so grave a precaution ? The answer is, that with my heart burning within me I am bound down to neutrality. At day the heart will rebel and take the head, at night I will think of the frightful responsibility of the men who are at the helm in our little boat, and acknowledge that they have a right to expect that we should all, when speaking or writing publicly, consider their wishes, and so I rise in the morning and throw yesterday's letter, written without restraint, on the fire.

But I must try over and over again till the message is so worded that the Censor conscience will let it pass. I shall to-day not attempt to send a special message, but to shape in words one or two of the myriads of thoughts which the war has roused, and which must be worked out and fitted into the soul's aspect of life and eternity, God and man, or stand in the background like some threatening ogre ready at any moment to steal in upon you and make chaos of the system that forms the foundation of your spiritual life.

Mrs. Collins Odgers in her beautiful address to the Women's League, called 'The Dweller in the Innermost,' touches upon one of the many miseries engendered by the war, the tantalising, paralysing doubt created in many devout minds. Is there a God ? and if there is, can God be wise, loving, and almighty, while such atrocities are committed, such sufferings inflicted in a world created and governed by Him ? Many and many a man or woman whose house was built on their faith in God, feels the foundation shake, and cries out in wild despair for help and support. Belonging to that group of men and women in whom the war has confirmed not shaken faith in the God of Christ, I feel called upon to bear witness to His existence, His perfect love and All-mightiness.

But let there be no misunderstanding at the outset. I believe in the Almightiness of God, bearing in mind, though, that even to Almightiness there is a limit, it cannot pass the borders of the impossible. No power in heaven or on earth can make four equal with five, can make a bird fly in the air and perch on a branch at the same time, can make a circle and a square cover each other. And not even Almighty God can endow man with a free will and yet retain absolute power over his will and responsibility for his actions. I believe in man's free will. I feel responsible for my own words and actions. I know very well that an opponent to this, my belief, can drive me back step by step, till I stand on the very edge of a yawning abyss, across which reason can throw no bridge. I have no fear, I know I can skip the abyss and find firm rock on the other side on which to plant my foot, firm rock, uncovered by Luther. I believe in man's free will because I can not do otherwise. I have invited thought and reason to use all their force, I have done away with any artificial barrier in their way, I have listened with an open ear and a submissive mind, and when they have done their uttermost and made havoc of all arguments that stood up against them, I have had to rise quietly and say to them : And now you have done I shall go back to my post, and say and do thus or thus. And I shall feel responsible for what I say and do, for so has God made me that I can not do otherwise. God help me. Amen !

I believe in the free will of men. I believe man was free to follow Christ and worship his God. I believe he chose out of his own free will to follow self and worship the Golden Calf. I believe he sought his own not God's will when he allotted the "place in the sun" to the strongest who could push aside the weaker, when he put his skill, his brains, his genius, the powers of nature as he discovered them, at the disposal of the strong, when he gave him the wings of the bird, the gills of the fish, the fire and vapours of hell to use for his own selfish end. I believe man was free when he sought self-satisfaction before he sought the kingdom of God and His righteousness, when he strove to satisfy his selfish wishes, ambitions, and appetites, caring but little for God's will and His commands. I believe all this, and believing it, and seeing man successful and triumphant in the course he had chosen, I sometimes found it difficult to believe in the existence and power of the God of Christ.

Then came the war ! God's pronouncement on the means and ways of man. Self-willed, selfish man's meeting with the Lord whose great command is : Love and self-surrender.

Then came the war ! Not a revengeful, angry Father's punishment of a rebellious, unruly child, but the Almighty Creator's demonstration of the fundamental law : Whatsoever a man soweth such shall he reap !

Then came the war ! God's sermon to every heart and soul in humanity. Ye who have ears to hear, hearken.

"Look," says the Lord, "I placed you in a boundless, law-bound universe a free being, endowed with powers to read it rightly and work it out a Paradise. I gave you for watch a conscience, for guide a Christ, and for help my willing ear and hand. What have you made of it all ?"

Sitting here in my quiet home, in a country which has as yet been spared the direct sufferings and horrors of war, like Eve and Adam I try to hide myself from the presence of the Lord, but my heart calls out : Mea culpa. What have I done in my little world to make it into a paradise ? How did I fight the evil spirit of my age now incarnated in torpedoes, bombs and shells, and poisonous gas ?

Maybe you, who are in the midst of action, have but little time left for such reflections. I feel that if the day should come when my country should be called to the front I should place all that is in me, head, heart, and hand at its disposal, and have nothing left for other tasks ; but this fact does not prove me wrong in what I think and say now. At the surface the war is a war between nations, at the bottom it is the idealist's rising against the tyranny of materialism, God's champion fighting the Prince of the World. Europe is one bloody battlefield. Yes, for Europe is fighting an evil spirit. The spirit which would fain make man believe that Might is Right, that self is God, and the Kingdom of God, with its laws and commands, a mere phantasm.

If this is not the truth, then God help us. If all this precious blood is flowing, all these homes are destroyed, all this suffering inflicted on man and beast, all this heart-breaking going on, all these hopes shattered merely for some political end, simply to change the border lines on the world-map—then, indeed, God help and forgive us, for then we are nought but fratricides, then we can only ask to have a Cain's mark stamped on our brow.

The war is raging on the battlefields. The men are suffering and dying in the trenches, nobly and uncomplainingly, giving their lives for their countries ; but the victory must be won in the hearts, the hearts of all lands ; it is there the fiend is to be met, and must be slain and annihilated. Humanity has let itself be overruled by God's enemy—the spirit of selfishness, the spirit of envy, of impurity, of self-indulgence, of lust and perversity ; if it does not now succeed, if that spirit is still left master of the hearts, then God help us, for we shall have to suffer over and over again what we suffer now, till we win—or die. Never did the God of Christ more clearly reveal Himself, His might and power, than at this moment. Can any man think it possible that we should have had this war if we had all done to our neighbour as we would that he should do to us ? Does any man think we shall ever secure peace for ourselves till that golden rule is laid as the foundation of the laws of all lands, and till from being a command it has become a firm decision in the hearts of men : I will do to my neighbour as I would that he should do to me ? No ! for God liveth and ruleth

I am the citizen of a neutral country and I am writing publicly. I will say nothing that is not neutral ; but the laws of neutrality do not forbid me to love my friends and fellow-believers across the sea, and so I sign myself your loving friend,

Mary B. Westenholz.

DIDON AND GERMANY.

In April of the year 1880 Père Didon, the most illustrious member of the Dominican Order since his master, Lacordaire, was summoned to the presence of Père Larroca, then General of the Order, at Rome. Didon had been denounced to his General because of the freedom of certain views which he had just expressed in his Lenten course of sermons at the Church of the Trinity in Paris. The result of the Roman interview was that Didon was ordered to retire to Corbara, a lonely monastery of the Order in Corsica, where he was neither to preach nor to hear confessions; but to devote his time exclusively to prayer and study. After eighteen months the exile of Corbara, recalled, again met his General at Marseilles, and received the authority of the latter to resume forthwith his apostolic mission at Paris. But Didon had formed other plans. At Corbara he had sketched out and actually commenced, a study in the life of Christ. He asked, therefore, for permission to study for, at least, six months in Germany, and afterwards to complete his researches by a journey to the Holy Land. "It is impossible," he told the General, "to write of the life of Christ to-day without having seen the Holy Places, and without a knowledge of the great exegetical work which has its focus in Germany." The desired permission was immediately granted, and during the year 1882 Didon spent six months in Germany studying in turn at the Universities of Leipsic, Berlin, Göttingen, Munich, and Tübingen. During his visit to the Holy Land, and after his return, he worked up the notes which he had jotted down during his German tour into a volume which was published in February, 1884, under the title of 'Les Allemands.' This work was received with an outburst of hostile and angry criticism as unworthy of a Frenchman and a Catholic. The critical storm, however, passed by as rapidly as it had arisen, and calmer criticism has ever since found in it one of the fairest appreciations of the spirit of Germany that has come from any modern pen. I have just re-read it after an interval of twenty years, and it has occurred to me that it might be worth while to recall, in honour of Didon's quite prophetic insight, the following extract from the chapter entitled 'L'Esprit National.'

"We must concede to Germany the merit of having known how, for a century past, to give a free and powerful development to her national spirit. There lies the secret of her fortunes. German unity could not have realised itself without force. It implied on the part of Prussia that policy of audacity and cunning which consisted in deliberately preparing quarrels, in giving herself the appearance of the offended party, in risking the future upon a victorious throw of the dice.

"Humanity marches along a highway stained with blood. Murder and violence commingle in the evolution of peoples, in the expansion of races, in the foundation of religions as of empires.

"Thence in Germany that militarism whose formidable power we have described. It forms part of the national spirit, is even its predominant element. It has been pushed so far that Germany is no longer anything but one vast entrenched camp. Every German is a soldier by the mere fact that he is a man, a male adult child of the German Fatherland.

"But what crimes, passions, injustices, hypocrisies, ruins, are covered by that dazzling rubric of the greatness of the Fatherland!

"A bitter vengeance, provoked by the victories of Napoleon, planted the national spirit like a seed in the sands of Brandenburg. Formidable wars have watered it and fostered its growth. And, to-day, an inexorable destiny is urging Germany on to new and bloodier struggles. The end is not achieved. The unity of the German Fatherland is not as yet definitely attained. Pan-Germanism is not satisfied with the Empire of Northern Germany. It aims at including all Germans without exception.

"Who would venture to believe that a pacific policy will ever be able to realise this colossal unity? Who does not see Austria inexorably pushed southwards, hurled Eastwards towards the Balkans, and, as it were, hunted out of Germany? Who does not see Russia forced into gathering all the European Slavs beneath her wing, and condemned to an inevitable conflict with German policy on the day that the Turks are driven out of Europe across the Bosphorus?

"The temple of Janus is not on the eve of being closed in our modern world. On the contrary the era of great conflicts seems to be just opening more menacingly than ever. I pray that in that crossing of the mighty swords my country may have lost neither the vigour of her arm nor her sacred passion for justice."

All this, even to the use of the word and the perception of the thing—Pan-Germanism, in the year 1882! Truly the great Dominican had eyes.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE MODERN WORLD.

Jesus and Christianity in the Twentieth Century. By Alfred Hall, M.A. London, The Lindsay Press, 2*s*. net.

Mr. Hall's book takes its place in the new series of "Modern Handbooks of Religion" issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Its title suggests a reference to Weinel's admirable study of 'Jesus in the Nineteenth Century,' but Mr. Hall, writing in the early years of a new century, has not the same scope for a full historical survey. What he offers is rather a consideration of the present situation, from a Unitarian's point of view, as regards the religious attitude towards Jesus, and the significance of Christianity in the world. The opening chapter furnishes a vindication, as against Drews and others, of the historical reality of Jesus, and this is followed by a discussion of his religion, his consciousness of God, and his attitude towards the Messiahship. The distinctiveness of the message of Jesus is found in his setting forth of the simple elements of universal humanity, the great essentials of human nature, as the true inspiration for all time. The questions of the relevancy of Christianity to the modern world, and its finality, are then dealt with, in chapters which form the central, and to our mind the strongest and most helpful section of the book, and the last hundred pages discuss the three chief forms taken by Christianity at the present time, the sacramental or sacerdotal, the Evangelical or propitiatory, and the ethical. It is the last of these, in the author's view, which clearly holds the promise of the future. The moral appeal is, of course, present in the other two, often, as Mr. Hall admits, with a very clear and urgent note, but they put other elements of their presentation of Christian truth in the first place, and make for them exclusive claims, whereas in "Ethical Christianity" it is the moral claim that is absolute, the final seat of authority is found in the soul of man, in direct and personal communion with the living God.

The chapter on the relevancy of Christianity opens with a statement of the difficulties suggested by the fact that the teaching of Jesus, as we have it recorded in the Gospels, has no direct bearing on many of the conditions and problems of modern life; but then Mr. Hall goes on to show that any such expectation misconceives entirely the nature of Christianity and the possibilities of any teaching at a particular period in the progressive life of the world. What Christianity furnishes in the personal life and teaching of Jesus is the supreme impulse to the true spirit of life. What is essential in it is not any completed system of precepts, but an ideal based on principles, the fundamental principles of the Kingdom of God. These are found to be always relevant, whatever new complications and problems may arise in the various stages of human development, and the spirit of life in Jesus furnishes the vital energy for their application. When, therefore, Mr. Hall, in the next chapter asks, "Is Christianity final?" the intention is to show that none of the forms taken by Christianity in the past, necessarily coloured and limited by the particular conditions of the times, can be regarded as its final or complete expression. It is not a final system, formulated once for all, but a progressive spirit of life, the heart of which is found in the supreme personality of human history. Mr. Hall refers in his Preface to other volumes of the series in which his book appears, as dealing with important questions regarding Christianity which he has left untouched. There is a passage in the volume by the Rev. R. N. Cross on 'Communion of Man with God,' dealing with the personal influence of Jesus, as an inspiration in religion, which may helpfully supplement Mr. Hall's contribution to the study of this subject. We felt more than once as we followed his argument that there was more to be said as regards the quickening power of personal leadership, the leadership of the "Chief of faithful souls," as a vital element in Christianity, a source of inspiration in the fellowship of our life with God not to be neglected. It is a question of degree of emphasis, not of any fundamental divergence of judgment.

In Slums and Society. By James Adderley. London, T. Fisher Unwin, 6*s*.

Of course, Canon Adderley was bound to write his reminiscences, and, of course, when he did so they were bound to be overflowing with good spirits. He has the happy knack of enjoying life and of seeing all his friends through rose-coloured spectacles. He has tried his hand at many things, and the duty of inconsistency is probably an article of his creed. High Churchman, ascetic, modernist, and clerical wit, he has been all in turn, or perhaps it would be truer to say that he has been all of them together; and now he has done his bit as a chaplain at the Front, cheering the men in their difficulties, and we may be sure making religion a very vital and human thing to them. Something of the Franciscan spirit has gone into his making, its spendthrift carelessness about personal interests and its gaiety of heart. Like some of the early friars he seems to revel in absurdities for their own sake. All this the reader may find for himself, and he will be a very peevish person if he is not comforted and helped by a little wholesome laughter in the midst of our present discontents. We have no space to sample his "chestnuts." Moreover, the daily press has rifled them with a generous hand already. Unlike some clerical witticisms they are all most innocent fooling, and leave no bad taste in the mouth. Behind them all is the earnestness and personal consecration of a man who has spent his life in doing good, and still makes it his boast that he is vicar of a slum parish.

The Way of the Cross. By V. Doroshevitch. With an Introductory Note by Stephen Graham. London, Constable & Co., 2*s*. 6*d*. net.

This slender volume consists of a series of word pictures of the great flight of Russian and Polish refugees before the German invasion last autumn. The author is a popular journalist, with a strange and haunting style of his own. His descriptions are written in short sentences, which are often left unfinished, abrupt questions, notes of exclamation; but the result is magical. We see these homeless crowds as they tramp the roads; we listen to their talk; their misery enters into our souls. This is no ordinary war book by a writer in search of exciting copy. It is real literature, strong, terrible, and ennobling, and it is Russian to the core. Here is the conclusion. The author is giving three reasons why this great calamity is passing without tumult.

And the third reason:—

—Sobriety.

Great and holy sobriety.

That which saves Russia in a year of unprecedented trial.

A measure inspired by the very God Himself of the Russian land.

No one can give drink to these unhappy people. How they would have drunk, if only to get rid of their grief, to get rid of the remembrance of what they had lost: farms, wives, children.

That's how it would have been.

But thanks to sobriety this great unhappy people, afflictedly, calmly, with the calm of martyrs, makes its grievous —Way of the Cross.

The Dawn of Religion in the Mind of the Child: a Study of Child Life. By Edith E. Read Mumford, M.A. London, Longmans, Green & Co., 1*s*. 6*d*. net.

This is a delightful book, in which Mrs. Mumford has developed in greater detail the contents of a single chapter in her earlier work on 'The Dawn of Character.' It is a book for mothers most of all, but for teachers also, and no one who desires to enter with true and understanding sympathy into the life and mind of little children could fail to be helped by the clear insight, the earnestness and the wisdom of practical experience, which Mrs. Mumford has brought to the treatment of her subject. The right beginning, she pleads, is not to be found by imposing the thought and doctrines of grown up people on the mind of the child. This leads often to unexpected and astonishing results, of which instances are given. The dawn of religion comes through unconscious growth, as the influence of the mother's own religion, the reverence and tenderness of her attitude and tone of voice in prayer, her thankfulness and trust in the unseen Giver of all good, wakens a response in the heart of the little one. Then, through the simplest words of natural affection, the child may be encouraged to find its own way to spontaneous thankfulness and trust, and in the next stage, to unselfish purpose and effort in well-doing. The thought of God as Father is the natural way in a happy home; but where that is not possible, where "father" stands to the child for dread and cruelty and debasing scenes, the teacher may find the open way through the suggestion of God as Creator, in the beauty and wonder of nature, the mystery and the delight of the growing plant and the opening flower, and from that foundation build further, through the active purpose and affection of the child. On the two great commandments of love to God and man Mrs. Mumford urges that the natural and wholesome growth of the child's religion must be nurtured, with great care to understand what is going on in the mind of the little one, and to encourage natural expression and a perfect openness of confidence and sympathy. Some of the instances of the spontaneous prayers of little children, and of their thoughts concerning God, are very quaint and even grotesque, while others are very touching. We are grateful to Mrs. Mumford for her book. One feels that she is thoroughly at home within the charmed circle of the children's own life, and can be of great help to others who long to enter in.

The Eyes of Our Children. By N. Bishop Harman, M.A., M.B., F.R.C.S. London, Methuen & Co., 1*s*. net.

This is the kind of simple manual which may be cordially recommended to parents, teachers and all who take an interest in public health. It deals with the common ailments of the eye and the proper method of treating them, and puts all who have to do with children on their guard against the fatal influence of bad habits, bad print and bad light. Dr. Harman is an enlightened reformer as well as an eminent oculist, and his pages are full of admirable suggestions about the proper lighting of class-rooms, the value of out-door life, the use of a large model type in books for infants, and the need of a close study of the psychology of a child's mind for the use of many of the defects of vision. Among his practical suggestions is one for a proper selection from the Bible for ordinary school use, from which all the parts which are never read should be omitted in the interest of better type for the rest. "We want," he says, "a school Bible of one-fourth the present mass; and this, produced in the size of an ordinary school Bible, would allow of good paper and good print, and the result would be worthy of the greatness of the book and the use to which it was to be put. If Cromwell in the days of the Civil War, when the Bible was the one and only book, could make a 'Soldier's Bible,' there is no reason why we cannot have a 'Children's Bible.'"

No Sunday school manual of recent years has been more popular than Life in Palestine when Jesus Lived, by Dr. J. E. Carpenter. First issued in 1884 it now appears in a revised and enlarged edition. We welcome most heartily the larger page and its more handsome appearance. There is a short bibliography of the best recent books. Dr. George Adam Smith's invaluable 'Historical Atlas of the Holy Land' appeared too recently to be included. It is a book which Sunday school teachers ought to be able to consult in any good reference library. Dr. Carpenter's opening pages become at once more fascinating with the help of good maps. (London, The Sunday School Association, Essex Street, 1*s*. 6*d*. net.)

Mr. Fielding Hall has followed up his last book, 'The Field of Honour,' with another volume of stories and poems entitled 'For England,' dealing, not with actual warfare itself, but with the indirect effects of war upon the homes of England. Messrs. Constable & Co. are the publishers.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

ADDRESS BY THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR.

The Annual Meeting of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society was held on Tuesday afternoon at the Westminster Palace Hotel, when the new President, Sir Victor Buxton, took the chair for the first time, and an address on Booker Washington, full of delightful humour, sympathy, and appreciation was delivered by Dr. Page, the American Ambassador. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, after paying a tribute to the memory of the late President, his father, whose devotion to their cause was not, he said, a mere hereditary instinct but the result of his own hatred of injustice and oppression in any form, drew attention to various passages in the report dealing with the progress made during the year. In particular he referred to the welcome fact that the Colonial Secretary had agreed to the creation of six posts in the Gold Coast Medical Service for qualified West African natives, and to the crowning act of Lord Hardinge's Viceroyalty in obtaining assurances from the Imperial Government that the system of indentured coolies sent from India to certain Crown Colonies and Protectorates would be abolished. They had a period of great activity before them, for when this terrible war was over all sorts of questions would arise as to the treatment of native races in the tropical dependencies of Europe. The motion was seconded by Mr. Crommelin, the Liberian Minister, and carried.

Dr. Page began his address by describing his first visit to Tuskegee, the little town in Alabama where Booker Washington, who was himself born a slave, first began to teach in a small negro school. That school is now larger than the town itself ; it has its own post office, and the population is about 2,000. It has one hundred buildings, many of which are very imposing, and about 1,200 young men and women from all over the black world have come there to broaden their character and learn how to build up their race. Dr. Page knew Mr. Washington for twenty years. He had the greatest admiration for him and took the keenest interest in his work, because it made for a constructive solution of the troublesome negro problem in the United States. That problem, though still acute, did not arouse such fierce controversy as it used to do in the years gone by, and he would say without hesitation that the work of this one man had been the strongest single influence in the direction of taking the negro problem out of the region of wrangling into the region of definite helpful effort. It was not long before young Booker Washington, in the ramshackle building where his first band of negro pupils were taught to read, write, and cipher, began to have wider visions, and to formulate ideas which afterwards took practical shape. He developed the philosopher's view of education, and in the children who came to be taught in this town in the "black belt"—that is, the region where the blacks outnumber the whites—he saw the whole backward community of God-forsaken, ignorant, thriftless freed slaves and impoverished white. He devised ways of educating and training a people, and the acquisition of mere learning was always subordinated to the study of subjects of practical utility and the formation of character. The boys and girls were trained in all the useful crafts (Washington's own son was taught bricklaying, and Dr. Page saw him at work on a wall), and at the annual gatherings, when people came to see what they were doing, they did not read essays, but exhibited the work of their own hands—an engine, a waggon, and so forth. Most of the money that had gone to the building up of Tuskegee had come from private donors who had been obtained by Mr. Washington's efforts in going up and down the land explaining his aims and methods. The fact that at one time he had to beg about £20,000 a year to pay the deficit for the maintenance of the school had brought him into touch with all kinds of men and women, and enabled him to make the white people understand the negro as they would never have done otherwise. That was, perhaps, as he once said, the greatest part of his work. Continuing, Dr. Page said that Booker Washington was a man of infinite wisdom who possessed the two most attractive qualities of the negro, a love of humour and a love of melody. His steadfast purpose and his good judgment were his great qualities. He refused to be led aside by any controversies, and followed his vision without ever losing its inspiration. What he said of the negro might have been said of him—that he was four-fifths human nature. He had the humility that comes of complete absorption by a great purpose, and although he was not a man of learning, he was a singularly compelling speaker. All who knew him and admired him and learned from him, see more clearly now than in his life-time how wisely he planned, and how nobly he carried out his ideal.

Mr. Joseph A. Pease, M.P., in a vote of thanks to Dr. Page, expressed the warmest appreciation of the fact that His Excellency had spared time in the midst of his pressing duties to deliver such an interesting address to the members of their Society. Mr. Fred Maddison, who seconded the resolution, said he was most grateful for the simple and human way in which Dr. Page had spoken to them, and for the entire absence from his manner and remarks of an attitude of indifference to the "common people" which they usually associated with diplomats. He embodied the spirit of democracy, and the future belonged to men who believed in justice and in democracy as the best means of securing it.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

The Annual Meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union was held on Saturday, March 25, at Hyde Chapel and Schools, Gee Cross. The service in the chapel at 3 o'clock was conducted by the Rev. F. H. Vaughan. The sermon was preached by Dr. Mellone, Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester. The Business Meeting was held at 4 o'clock, when the Annual Report and Financial Statement were adopted, and the officers re-elected, namely, President, the Rev. H. E. Dowson; Hon. Treasurer, Mr. W. Hudson; Hon. Secretary, the Rev. John Ellis. The Report, while recording no special missionary activity, owing to the war, emphasises the welcome fact that churches of different denominations are beginning to realise their underlying unity, and that, in spite of the depletion in their vigorous manhood, there was a disposition everywhere, in young and old, to re-double efforts to maintain faith in the eternal things of love, justice, and truth. In the evening there was a large attendance at the public Meeting, which was held at the school, under the chairmanship of Mr. A. H. Barlow, supported by Mrs. Bernard Allen, organiser of the Belgian Hospital Fund; Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the Revs. H. E. Dowson, F. H. Vaughan, and John Ellis, Mrs. Dowson, and Mr. J. D. Nuttall, who presided at the piano.

The Rev. John Ellis moved a cordial vote of thanks to the ministers and congregation of Hyde Chapel for their hospitality, which was seconded by Mr. Ashton, and carried, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan replying. It was announced that a telegram had been received from Mr. P. M. Oliver, Parliamentary candidate for Knutsford Division, expressing regret for his inability to be present on account of having to attend urgent Red Cross business. Dr. Mellone, in replying to a vote of thanks for his sermon, said if there was one thing he would emphasise once more, it was the responsibility that rested upon their people as a religious community to prove to the world at large, and, above all, to the great nations of Christendom, that they were fit to be trusted with the freedom that they claimed and enjoyed. The plain truth was that they had not yet proved that they were fit to be trusted with it.

The Chairman welcomed the East Cheshire Christian Union to Gee Cross, and also extended a hearty welcome to the speakers. The time, surely, was opportune for taking counsel together. All around one found shattered ideals and stricken fields, and never was the need greater for taking counsel together to the end of mutual helpfulness, encouragement and inspiration. The thing that came uppermost time after time in his mind was the perversion of science and industry. They were divorced, as it seemed, from religious and any worthy ideal, and after that war of arms they were told of a war of peace, and problems of re-organisation and reconstruction that would face them. He could not profess to be bringing in new remedies or discovering remedies, but he was disturbed by the thought of the fatal effect upon their individual and national life that might come about in the carrying out of those things. Education, the work of reconstruction, business, should all be controlled by right ideals and worthy motives. For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? They should more and more draw their inspiration from Christ and His steady and guiding influence, and the measure of their success as churches would be the extent to which individuals asked themselves how far they were instruments of God, and the earnestness with which they should bear witness to their loyalty to the faith for which that Union stood. The conviction had grown upon him during the last two years of the greater need for that religion, and just as in their daily avocations success followed systematic training, patience and method, so similar agencies were needed in the endeavour for a Christian life—regular attendance at service, systematic reading and preparation, and quiet premeditation.

Mrs. Bernard Allen gave a description of the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund which deeply interested her hearers, and her allusion to the responsibility laid upon those for whom the brave sons of Belgium are making such supreme sacrifices evoked a warm response.

A collection was taken for the Fund at the close of the address which realised close upon £9.

Mr. Chancellor, M.P., brought the greetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the meeting. He suggested that one way their churches might be made to thrive and prosper was by calling on the capacity of the layman to the fullest extent. The call on the layman to-day was great because so many of their ministers were away at the front. Referring to the effect of the war on Christendom in our own country, he said, two tendencies were in operation. On the one hand patriotism was coming to assume its more debased and unholy form, and was often a synonym for mere blind, insensate hatred of the enemy; on the other hand it was uniting in the sense of comradeship and brotherhood all classes and sects. It was breaking down barriers of caste and creed that had too long divided them, and that was its Christian aspect. The great lesson was being learnt that they were members one of another. That which they shared in common was morally and fundamentally far greater than the things that divided them. It was the duty of individuals and churches to strive after truth, to make it operative in their own lives, and to preach it amongst others. That was the ground of missionary effort. It was their duty as a missionary society; but the method must not be imposed by authority and coercion, but by persuasion and argument and a community's conviction to make it a living force.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson moved a vote of thanks to the speakers, and spoke of what their forefathers had done for their church. He also spoke with enthusiasm of manifestations of a disposition for unity and fellowship in the churches of the district.

The Rev. C. Biggins seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

On Easter Sunday the Rev. H. E. Dowson will complete forty-nine years as minister at Gee Cross and be within twelve months of his jubilee. Already preparations have been set on foot for celebrating the event. In announcing the anniversary the Hyde Chapel Calendar for April quotes Tennyson's lines with a fitness which will be endorsed by all Mr. Dowson's friends:—

A life in civic action warm,
A soul on highest mission sent.

The beauty of Hope Street Church, Liverpool, has recently been considerably enhanced by the addition of two stained glass windows, one in the north and one in the south aisle. The windows are the gifts of the relatives of Mrs. C. T. Bowring, who died in 1890, and of Mrs. Stoddart (Mrs. Bowring's eldest daughter), who died last year. They are described as "excellent in design and workmanship," and have been executed by the same firm as the windows in the Lady Chapel of Liverpool Cathedral.

Miss Helen L. Phillips of Carlisle was to have received a formal welcome into the ministry at the Spring Conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association at Middlesbrough on Tuesday. Unfortunately owing to local conditions the Conference could not be held. Miss Phillips, who was formerly at Christ Church, Nottingham, has done excellent service as a lay worker for several years, and has richly earned her recognition as a fully qualified minister.

The announcement that the position of Head Master of University College School will be vacant at midsummer recalls the conspicuous services which this great public school has rendered to medicine and learning and the public services of the country. Like University College it was founded on the principle of no religious tests.

Many boys from leading Unitarian families were educated there in the days before Nonconformists had begun to frequent the older public schools. Mr. Walter Baily of Hampstead was Chairman of the governors for several years, and on his retirement a short time ago he was succeeded by Mr. Harold Wade, an old boy and champion athlete, who still holds the record for running. The old boys are represented in the Unitarian ministry by Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter and the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

One of our ministers was suggesting the other day that Chesterton's essay on 'Religion and Brass Bands' might, with advantage, be reprinted and sent round to all our organists, in the hope that it might lead to a more frequent use of brighter music.

The trouble is that Liberal Christianity has not been gifted with many original musicians, and that organists, therefore, have to use the conventional music. Even our hymn books, he complained, do not balance the themes of sin, sorrow, and death sufficiently with the exultation of the happy warrior and the certainty of the final triumph of the right. He has a theory that the last hymn in every service should be a hymn of triumphant rejoicing, but knows no book that will supply three months without repetitions.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—A special memorial service in honour of the late Mrs. Samuel Smethurst was conducted in Richmond Hill Church on Sunday last by the Rev. N. J. Hawthorn Jones. Mrs. Smethurst, who was a loyal supporter of the Ashton movement ever since its inception, died at her residence on April 4. Her loss was keenly felt by a large number of admirers, who attended the service to pay their tribute of respect to her memory.

Bristol.—On Sunday, April 2, Dr. Tudor Jones unveiled a portrait of the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, late minister of Lewin's Mead Meeting, Bristol, which had been subscribed for by the teachers and scholars of the Girls' Department. On Monday, April 3, a united Sunday School Teachers' Conference, at which Lewin's Mead Meeting and the Domestic Mission were represented, was held, thirty-four being present. Dr. Jones took the chair, and an instructive paper was read by Mr. Thorburn, followed by a discussion. Two old teachers in khaki were present. On Thursday, April 6, the elder scholars held their Social, when about fifty were present, including Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones, who are always warmly welcomed at these meetings. On Sunday, April 9, the scholars had the unexpected pleasure of a visit from Dr. Blake Odgers, who gave an interesting address, after which prizes were distributed to the girls by the minister, and to the boys by Mrs. Tudor Jones. A collection was taken in aid of the Belgian Hut Fund.

Glossop.—On Sunday last the Fitzalan Street Church kept a day of Thanksgiving. Owing to the work of the ladies of the congregation being diverted to war purposes £50 was required to clear the church of its obligations before the annual meeting. The members attended the services in large numbers and brought their thank-offerings with them. The minister (the Rev. Joseph Wilson) preached in the morning on 'The Widow's Mite,' and in the evening on 'The Upper Room.' The collections amounted to £51.

Cardiff.—A public meeting was held on April 6 at West Grove Unitarian Church, under the auspices of the Women's League, in aid of the Belgian Hospital Fund. Mrs. Bernard Allen, the organiser of the Fund, who was listened to with great interest, delivered an address explaining what the Fund was, how it originated, what it had achieved, and what it still hoped to do. The chair was occupied by Mr. H. W. Thompson. The Lord Mayor of Cardiff (Dr. R. J. Smith) moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. Bernard Allen, which was seconded by Mrs. G. Carslake Thompson. The collection taken in aid of the Fund amounted to £10 16*s.* 3*d.*

Dundee.—The memorial window which has been erected by the congregation to celebrate the Jubilee of the settlement of the Rev. Henry Williamson as minister of the Unitarian church was unveiled at a special service held on Saturday, April 1. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, B.A., an old friend of Mr. Williamson's, and the unveiling ceremony was performed by Mrs. Barlow, Glasgow, Vice-President of the Scottish Unitarian Association. Previous to the act of unveiling the window, Mrs. Barlow delivered the following short address: "Friends, we have met together to-day upon what seems to me a somewhat unique occasion. Unique in many ways, as we are here to unveil a memorial window which, so far as I know, is the first memorial window to be placed in a Unitarian church in Scotland. The window is erected, not in memory of some one who has passed from our midst, but is a thank-offering for a life still spared to us, and in recognition of fifty years of faithful service and ministry rendered by Mr. Williamson to this congregation. In thus commemorating life and service, it resembles our own Unitarian faith, which trusts to the everlasting love of a living God, whom we call our Father, and seeks strength and inspiration from the life and teaching of Jesus, our leader and brother. The inscription on the window carries a note of joy and exultation, and is a song associated with the birth of Jesus: 'Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.' Let us hope and pray that soon we may unite in singing the conclusion of the angel's song: 'Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace and good-will towards men.'" The window, which was universally admired, shows the figure of an angel bearing on a scroll the message given above, while at the bottom is the inscription: "Erected by the congregation to celebrate the completion of fifty years' ministry by the Rev. Henry Williamson, 1866-1916." At tea, which was afterwards served, Mr. Williamson expressed his appreciation of the beauty of the window and the feelings which had prompted its erection, and also of the services rendered that day by Mrs. Barlow and Mr. Dunkerley. Votes of thanks to Mrs. Barlow and Mr. Dunkerley were moved by Mr. Dand and Mr. Meldrum respectively.

Leytonstone.—A social gathering was held in connection with the Unitarian Church on Saturday, at Haydn House, Fairlop Road, when an interesting lantern lecture on Hungary was given by the Rev. T. P. Spedding. The lecturer gave a very entertaining account of a pre-war visit to the country of Francis David, on which occasion he had taken the photographs which were shown on the screen. Mr. J. P. Rosling, minister of the church at Stratford, assisted with the lantern. During the evening Mr. J. W. Peterken spoke of the indebtedness of the congregation to the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson for his continued helpfulness and friendship, and thanked him for his monthly visit. Mr. Pearson, in acknowledging, said that 183 services had been conducted by 40 different preachers since the London District Association began the movement in Leytonstone three and a half years ago. Some of those preachers as well as members of the congregation were now fighting for their country; one had been wounded, and another killed in action. Their progress had naturally been checked by the war as well as by removals, but the finances, though small, had steadily improved.

London: Bermondsey.—A pleasing ceremony took place at Fort Road Church, Bermondsey, on Sunday evening last. After conducting the service, the Rev. Geo. Carter was the recipient of an illuminated address from the congregation, placing on record their congratulations on his 80th birthday, and at the same time expressing their appreciation of his work on behalf of Bermondsey and the Unitarian cause generally. Short speeches were made by the Secretary, Mr. A. H. Crocker, and by the Chairman, Mr. George Callow. Mr. Carter, in acknowledging the gift, said that he would greatly prize this token of the congregation's good feeling and friendship towards him.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Anniversary sermons were preached at the Church of the Divine Unity on April 9 by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, the offertories at both services being given to the Belgian Hospital Fund. On Monday the 10th inst. the annual congregational tea was held, followed by a meeting at which the chair was taken by the Rev. A. Hall. Sir J. Baxter Ellis moved and Mr. O. Levin seconded a resolution of cordial welcome to Mrs. Bernard Allen and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, who were present as representatives of the Belgian Hospital Fund. Mrs. Allen and Mr. Drummond then addressed the meeting on the work of the Fund.

Women's League.—The second Annual Meeting of the Manchester Associate Branch of the Women's League was held at Pendleton on April 1. There were eighty-two members present, representing the following branches: Ansdell, Bury (Bank Street), Chesham, Blackley, Chowbent, Failsworth, Gee Cross, Heywood, Monton, Oldham, Oldham Road (Manchester), Padiham, Pendleton, Stalybridge, and Stockport. Miss Johnstone presided. The Secretary (Miss Storrs) presented the Annual Report, and the Treasurer (Mrs. Stead) the Annual Balance Sheet, both of which were adopted. All the retiring officers were re-elected, with two additional Vice-Presidents, Mrs. Halstead of Ansdell, and Miss Dornan of Oldham. It was decided to hold the Summer Meeting at Monton on July 8. At tea-time cordial thanks were given to the Pendleton Branch for their hospitality. Afterwards the meeting re-assembled to hear the reports of the individual branches, which were both interesting and instructive.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A Public House without Intoxicants.

An interesting experiment on temperance lines is being contemplated by the Oxford Institute at 29 and 30, St. Aldate's, which has done such excellent work among the young men in the city of Oxford. Owing to the war the membership of the Institute has been depleted, and the responsible Committee have regretfully decided that they must relinquish the premises. Meetings have been held to consider whether these might still be devoted to social objects on a broader basis. Within a short distance of the Institute there are eight licensed houses, with others at no great distance, yet there is no place where persons of all ages and of either sex can obtain recreation and non-alcoholic refreshment. After much careful investigation it has been decided to appeal for £800 with which to inaugurate a people's palace or public house without intoxicants, which will be planned attractively so as to appeal to those who wish to spend a little spare time in a neighbourly and comfortable resort.

The idea is such an excellent one that it would seem only necessary to explain it in order to win cordial support. The National People's Palaces Association, Ltd., has promised to facilitate arrangements by means of a loan, and if the experiment—which has proved such a success elsewhere—should have equally good results in Oxford, an option has been given to the National People's Palaces Association, Ltd., to take it over at the end of two years, making subscribers of over £1 shareholders. A number of influential people are taking an interest in the scheme, including Lady Mary Murray, the Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Drummond, Dr. Jacks, the Hon. Mrs. Lyttelton, Canon Scott Holland, Miss Cunninghame Graham, and Mrs. Fotheringham (Hon. Secretary Oxford B.W.T.A.). Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. H. Ferris Pike, Hon. Treasurer, 43A Queen Street, Oxford.

Garibaldi's Grandson.

Garibaldi's love of animals, as well as his grandson, Bruno, who was killed recently in the war. His tutor writes (we killed in the war. His tutor writes (we quote from an American journal), "One day as I was going to the castle I saw Bruno bargaining with some boys of the village. He was spending his savings in buying captured birds, which he immediately set at liberty. The news of the generous purchaser spread rapidly through the village, and numbers of boys flocked to the castle, where Bruno, radiant with joy, spent his last coppers in setting free the poor captives." On another occasion he was discovered brandishing a big stick with which to belabour some thoughtless boys whom he saw every evening stoning the pigs as the shepherds brought them home. It is said that the cowardly youths fled before his "persuasive arguments" (enforced, we presume, by the big stick) and that they never ill-treated the pigs again. Another day he said, as he contemplated with sadness a collection of butterflies which had been given him, "This is a collection which will give me pain every time I look at it. Isn't it a shame that these poor creatures should suffer a horrible death for the pleasure of a collector? When I see a pin stuck through a butterfly, I almost feel as if I were being transfixed by it myself." This reminds us forcibly of the great Italian patriot, who cried as a child at the sight of a wounded grasshopper, and could not even bear to see a flower plucked wantonly or a plant torn up by the roots.

The Carnegie Trust.

The Executive Committee of the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust have issued a singularly interesting report, in which some excellent schemes are foreshadowed to be undertaken when the present crisis is over. The trust deed prohibits "any part of the trust funds from being used in any way which could lend countenance to war or to warlike preparations," and the opinion is also expressed that the money should not be used in the furtherance of projects of a purely temporary and abnormal character which are necessary at the moment. Special reports are being collected, however, in all parts of the United Kingdom bearing on the question of infant mortality, and all matters relating to the physical welfare of mothers and children, health houses, public baths and washhouses, and the like. In regard to libraries the chief recommendation is that assistance should be given to the development of libraries in rural districts, the idea being to circulate collections of books to the villages through the village schools over a fairly wide area. Another suggestion is the organisation of a system of book boxes to be supplied to British merchant vessels for the benefit of the crews. Grants are to be made, in addition to all this, with the object of fostering the love of music in rural districts, and a certain sum is to be devoted to the erection of a Nursery Training School at Hampstead, to be conducted by the Women's Industrial Council. In 1915 the income of this beneficent trust amounted to £183,951, and the expenditure to £81,686, of which £75,491 represented grants.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE are glad to be able to mark our Easter joy this year by passing another golden milestone in the growth of our Fund. The money that has been subscribed is an offering to human need, and so, in the best sense, an offering to God. It has also been an expression of one of the most beautiful aspects of church life, for many of the gifts have represented the feeling of compassion which vitalises a whole community. We are not in the least dismayed about the future, because many of us are likely to have less margin for generosity. We shall simply have to get more of the spirit of self-sacrifice into our hearts, and then we shall make the blessed discovery that the real joy of helping increases, when we have to plan and save in order to do it. As we stand this Easter-tide in the presence of the Cross, and try to judge our lives by its standards, there will be little temptation to sit down and congratulate ourselves upon what we have achieved. Its challenge to us is to go forward and to do better, in the faith that because we are God's children the generosity of love has no limits.

THE Schools Depot of the Fund continues its task of collecting work and money from a number of schools connected with it. Miss Rowe and Miss Taylor have sent in nearly 400 articles since January, 1916, including 120 pairs of socks and 50 knitted blankets. Mrs. Allen has seen these bright-coloured rugs on the beds of the hospitals where they have been sent, and the wards looked very gay with them. Besides work, contributions in money have been sent to help to pay for the school dinners of the Belgian children in Calais.

MRS. WORTHINGTON organised a Pound Day on Friday, April 8th, among the members of the "Working Parties" at Essex Church. The result was that she was able to bring a taxi-cab full of good things up to Hampstead—86 tins of various invalid foods. These were all packed on Saturday morning and despatched on Monday, and it is hoped they will be at a certain Convalescent Depot where they are greatly needed by the end of the week. A letter from the directrice of the canteen there, which arrived the day the case left, says: "Our stock of Benger's food is getting very low; I am just telling you in case you had a supply as you told me always to ask for things." This is the canteen described in THE INQUIRER a fortnight ago.

IN thousands of homes Easter this year will be a festival of hope and consolation. Without its message of victory over bodily death and all the powers of evil it would be hard for most of us to face the future with confidence and fortitude. But nothing is too terrible for us to bear when we feel that God uses the travail of our souls for the building of his kingdom. It is one of the paradoxes of faith that we are more certain of God in the days of storm, when life rocks to its foundations, than in the quiet years of comfort and peace.

MAY we interpose a plea here for greater dignity of life in some quarters. Some of our London streets and the loud advertisements of fashions in the newspapers would hardly give the impression to a stranger that we are actors in an appalling tragedy. We do not mean that we should go about with long faces and all mirth should cease, far from it. No wise man wants his countrymen to be miserable about the war. All its days of anxiety and gloom must be irradiated with the splendour of a great duty. But everything that savours of frivolity, expensive food, gay dressing and silly light-heartedness in amusements, is out of place. Life for all of us must be disciplined if we are to come safely to our goal. There are some things, which may be innocent enough at other times, for which there should be no room in our hearts just now.

THERE are also all the claims of sympathy and good manners to be considered. It does matter greatly what impression we make upon our partners in this struggle. In suffering, in sorrow, in physical loss and devastation they have borne a much bigger share in the war than most of our people have done. With fine generosity they recognise that our part is somewhat different from theirs and they have allowed no word of envy of our security to escape from their lips. But they may rightly ask that the thought of their sufferings should chasten our mood, and that we should occupy ourselves as little as possible with all the machinery of a luxurious civilisation while we are fighting as their Ally for the soul of the world. We should be sorry that the women of the occupied provinces of France, or the starving population of Poland, or the Serbian peasants who have survived the long trek should read the flaming advertisements in some of our most popular newspapers, as though Easter shopping were the order of the day and new fashions the first claim upon our purses. Would they not have a right to mutter something about fiddling while Rome is burning ?

The important statement by the Prime Minister on the subject of recruiting will be made after we have gone to press. A section of the Press has done its best to keep the public in a state of feverish anxiety and to make it as difficult as possible for the members of the Government to discuss the whole question calmly, and to compose possible differences of personal attitude. We do not pretend to understand all the motives which lie behind these campaigns of grumbling and abuse and violent criticism, and they are by no means confined to one section of the Press. But two forces are at work against which the public mind should be on its guard. The first is the temptation to adopt "rush" tactics as a method of escape from disappointment and delay. It is hard to keep the cool head and the steady hand when anxieties thicken and decision lingers.

But we think that the Press is also suffering a good deal from offended vanity. It has been set in its place since the beginning of the war, and made to feel that to a certain extent it is under orders. It resented the censorship and is intolerant of control. It still likes to feel that it makes and unmakes ministers and possesses a power superior to that of Parliament. It is well that occasionally the veil should be torn aside, and that the leader writer who wields a pen like a sceptre, as though the whole weight of empire rested on his shoulders, should be recognised as a clever mediocrity, with a name like that of any other man, or possibly as a second-rate politician whose gifts only entitle him to be a back-bench talker or a House of Commons bore. It would be a measure making for modesty and wholesomeness if for one week the leaders in every newspaper in the country were signed. We should begin to ask ourselves about some of them whether such tall talk is becoming in a small man, and many idols would be seen to have feet of clay.

All this does not mean that we want the Government to be free from criticism or have any belief in its infallibility. If the heaven-born dictator should arise, at once a king of justice, a master of method, and a manager of men, we are prepared to follow him to victory, and we should not judge the measures he might adopt for that end by their agreement with our own political creed before the war. But the rhetoric of clamour is always one of the basest of political weapons. Wise men pay little heed to it, for they know that its violence is in proportion to its lack of intelligence. If the present Government could be stampeded out of office we should have done nothing to bring victory nearer by a single day, and there is no guarantee that the national cause would be safe in the hands of their nameless successors.

Lord Bryce performed the opening ceremony in connection with a local memorial to Lieut. Gladstone at Hawarden last Saturday. In doing so he paid a noble tribute to the young manhood of the nation. We reproduce some of his words here for they should be read and treasured in every home that has sent its sons to the war.

> The old spirit of devotion [he said] is alive again in Great Britain. It is again the old England of ancestral fame. Some had thought that England had degenerated, but never has England shown herself worthier of the greatest tradition of her greatest days than she has done in these last months. An England that can do this is an England worth fighting for .... Let us remember these young heroes who have gone from us, not altogether with sorrow, but also with a sort of solemn thankfulness to God, who had strengthened them to do their duty; thankfulness to them, who have strengthened and helped us all by the way they have done their duty. Not in vain have they given their lives for their country, which is fighting for a cause to which honour and justice called her, a cause as righteous as any nation has ever sustained. The memories of those young heroes will for us and for those who come after shine like the lights of the world, lights that will burn for ever, set up around the altar of patriotism and of duty.

Everything that Dr. C. W. Eliot writes about the international aspects of American politics is of deep interest to us in this country. We have been anxious to respect the motives which underlie American neutrality and to refrain from any criticism of the attitude of the United States which could be construed into a claim upon her help. We recognise that she has her own burden to carry and that it is natural for her to look at the European conflict from a detached point of view which is impossible to us. But we do not pretend to be indifferent when a man of Dr. Eliot's balanced judgment and wide political vision pronounces definitely not merely for intervention in the present struggle, but for a close alliance with England and France. This momentous proposal is contained in a letter which he sent recently to the Boston Sunday Herald.

Dr. Eliot is moved not only by the identity between the ideals of the Allies, and those which all true Americans cherish, but also by the quite definite belief that it is necessary to ensure the United States from the menace of German aggression.

> In view of the unprecedented horrors and destructions of the present war [he writes] it is undoubtedly the interest of the Americans to protect themselves at all cost from invasion by Germany, supported by any possible allies, even if the risk be very small and the price of the insurance high. The promptest, surest, and most advantageous method of accomplishing that result is entrance by the United States into a permanent offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain and France to maintain the freedom of the seas for these allies under all circumstances, and to oppose attack by sea on any one of them. To this new alliance, other nations, present belligerent or present neutral, might be welcomed, but they would not be necessary to its success. Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Turkey would not be admissible, because they so easily absolve themselves from keeping their word.

Such an alliance, he argues, would be a source of protection in the future not only for the United States but also to the smaller maritime nations which are exposed to attack by the Germanic powers. Now that the German policy of domination has been made plain in the sight of all men, it is necessary in his judgment to consider the larger interests of civilisation instead of dwelling on the rights of neutrals. "It is time," he says, "for lovers of public liberty and justice to cease to be merely lookers-on at the prodigious catastrophe."

The centenary of the birth of Charlotte Brontë falls on Good Friday, the tercentenary of the death of Shakespeare on Easter Sunday. We announce elsewhere the arrangements which we have made for a series of commemorative articles in connection with the Shakespeare celebration. The article on "Supermen and Superwomen" in our present issue deals with the Brontë family. We make no apology for adding our voice to the national chorus. But as we listen to the discourse of learned men or charming writers, we need to remember that the true way to praise our classics is to read them, and having read them once to do so again, till their power enters into us and takes possession of the fortress of the mind.

THE REALISM OF THE CROSS.

The way of the cross is the way of light—via crucis via lucis—this was the confession of some of the holiest minds of a past age. The saying has come down to us, and we still imagine that we believe it, only it has long been our practice to expect light to come from another quarter, not from the suffering which we bear in our bodies but from the thoughts which pass through our minds. But it is experience which is the great teacher of men. No study of the records of human sorrow can take the place of the chastening of our own souls. Neither can long pondering upon a few chosen verses of the Sermon on the Mount bring us so close to the heart of Christ as one act of self-surrender and swift obedience. It is for this reason that arguments and discussions should play such a small part in the life of the Christian compared with acts. The bearing of the cross, not the right explanation of its meaning, is the badge of discipleship.

Not long ago this might have appeared a hard saying. We seemed to grow more spiritual as we emancipated ourselves from physical facts. We talked about Christian principles and ideals of goodness. We even spoke of the cross as a symbol of self-sacrifice, forgetful of the crude fact that it was made of real wood, that it was stained with real human blood, and that it was a real human body that hung there and suffered and died. But now something has happened to change the whole tenour of our thinking about these things. We have seen men die for the love of their country, for the sake of their friends. They have gone from among us, turning their backs upon the comforts of home and all the dazzling ambitions of youth, because duty and affection called. They have met wounds and death amid scenes of indescribable horror without a murmur on their lips or a thought of repining in their hearts. We don't want to talk about symbols and principles and abstract religious ideas when we can look upon men. Their death in some foul trench in Flanders does more to explain to us the meaning of the sordid cross on Calvary than a hundred homilies about sacrifice. Deep down in the heart of things they have much in common in the completeness of their obedience, in the willingness of their suffering, and in the power of such faithful love to make us emulate its goodness An influence of this kind theologians usually call redemptive, meaning by this word the deliverance which it works in our lives from slavery to selfish aims and base passions and ignoble fears. Such deliverance is never effected by teaching. It comes only from love in action. It needs the complete realism of the cross.

There are two errors, both deeply hostile to robust religious faith, into which many people have been betrayed in days when a widespread devotion to comfort has gone hand in hand with sentimental theories of life. The one is a strong repugnance to the thought of bodily death. In our hearts many of us are tempted to assert our right to length of days and ample enjoyment of the good things which this earth provides. To this cowardly and materialistic creed the cutting short of early promise is simply a vast calamity no matter in what cause life is laid down. Was it then a tragic mistake when Jesus died, refusing to accept deliverance, at the age of 30? Are the young men, who have no burning desire to serve their country and stay comfortably at home, wiser than those others who are giving themselves as a ransom for the freedom of the world? We need not attempt to answer these questions, for loyalty and affection have only one answer to give.

The other error, though very different on the surface, is often found occupying a compartment of the same mind. It is the belief that religion becomes spiritual in proportion as it lives among thoughts and feelings and renounces the use of physical force in the execution of the just commands of God. But at the root of this belief there is once again the taint of a false materialism. We are set in this world in order that we may employ the whole range of our physical powers under the control of a disciplined soul for the attainment of just and noble ends. The instruments of justice, even when they use bodily coercion or inflict wounds and death, are not evil in themselves. It is the purpose, whether of settled law or of private vengeance, which makes them good or bad. Few men fail to recognise this in the case of the things which we suffer. The cross is the gibbet of the criminal or the throne of the King of Saints according as the soul makes it so. But we must apply this truth to the whole range of our duties, whether of construction or resistance, remembering that we are set here to control physical conditions and not to ignore them. The religion we profess owes its growth in the world less to its preachers and dreamers than to its martyrs and men of action. It wins its victories by the use of physical means. Its greatest sermon was a deed. At the centre of Christianity there is a coarse and blood-stained cross; but more than all gracious promises and glowing prophecies it draws the heart of the world in its hunger for the love and peace of God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Thou say'st, "Take up my cross,
O Man, and follow me":
The night is black, the feet are slack,
Yet we would follow thee.

But O, dear Lord, we cry,
That we thy face could see!
Thy blessed face one moment's space—
Then might we follow thee!

Dim tracts of time divide
Those golden days from me;
Thy voice comes strange o'er years of change;
How can I follow thee?

Comes faint and far thy voice
From vales of Galilee;
Thy vision fades in ancient shades;
How should we follow thee?

O heavy cross—of faith
In what we cannot see!
As once of yore, thyself restore
And help to follow thee!

If not as once thou cam'st
In true humanity,
Come yet as guest within the breast
That burns to follow thee.

Within our heart of hearts
In nearest nearness be:
Set up thy throne within thine own:
Go, Lord: we follow thee.

Francis Turner Palgrave.

And there was also strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest.

And he said unto them, The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors.

But ye shall not be so: but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve.

For whether is greater, he that sitteth at meat, or he that serveth? Is not he that sitteth at meat? But I am among you as he that serveth.

St. Luke xxii. 24–27.

Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us.

Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God.

For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.

Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin.

And yet have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him.

For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth. Hebrews xii. 1–6.

O LORD, the eternal lifegiver, who liftest out of death and shame all godlike sufferers for Thy truth, and settest even their humanity on high, making it glorious in men's thoughts, by its partaking of Thy Eternal Spirit; give us grace to contend always for the right, and, if needs be, to suffer for it, and give us not over to any death of the soul, but rather lift us into newness of life, and let us love Thee and dwell with Thee for ever. Amen.

WORK IN ITALY.

When the European War broke out the Association of Free Believers and our Riforma Italiana were busily engaged on the work of internal organisation and on preparations for enlarging their sphere of labour. The war has, as was to be expected, enormously increased the difficulties with which we had to contend—difficulties to surmount which we required unlimited patience and undaunted faith in the future of our work, to the need of whose message of union the war bore such an unlooked-for witness in a Europe convulsed and rent asunder by this struggle à l'outrance.

The catastrophe was so utterly unexpected that the first feeling was one of stupefaction and panic; then came nine long months of agonising suspense and animated discussion as to what course we ought to take. On the decision depended not only the dignity and future of our own country, but, to a certain extent, the ulterior development of this appalling conflict. Once we had entered the lists on the side of the Entente, the whole moral and intellectual energy of the country was concentrated on the war itself, and on the task of lightening, as far as possible, the heavy burden it laid on the people.

It was natural enough to suppose that even if a movement like ours could find supporters and arouse interest in the time of peace in spite of the traditional indifference of the nation to religious problems, it could not hope to escape shipwreck at a time of such extraordinary tension. Many similar enterprises not of a strictly religious character were, as a matter of fact, forced to come to a standstill; many periodicals had to suspend publication, others had to reduce their size or to appear at longer intervals. The publisher of one review devoted to religious questions, which gave its readers, for the same price as we charge, twelve large illustrated monthly numbers a year, announced that he had lost over a fifth of his regular subscribers at the beginning of the new year.

Many young men have been called to the colours, incomes are very much reduced, the difficulty and expense of any sort of propaganda has immensely increased, as has the cost of printing, in some cases by as much as 50 per cent.

We had, moreover, to face another danger: the difference of opinion amongst our members, both as to our decision and our conduct of the war. Several were for neutrality, and the names of some of our collaborators are on the list of the Committee of the League of Neutrals, which has its headquarters at Lugano. Others, again, advocated the intervention of Italy. These dissensions did not, however, affect the inner life of our Association; it was somewhat slackened, it is true, but not upset in any way. The difficulties in our way were faced with renewed vigour, so that new and important gains made up amply for the inevitable losses.

The projected tour of our Secretary to the most important cities of Italy, for the purpose of visiting the various centres of the Association of Free Believers and of preparing for a National Congress, had to be given up; we stopped bringing out pamphlets for the time being, and concentrated our publishing efforts on the review; but the meetings of our leaders in Florence were more frequent, the activity of each one of them was increased, and we strove in every way to further our Riforma.

We received numerous answers to our promised inquiry into the state of religious life in Italy just before the war, many of these replies being from university professors, amongst whom we find such illustrious names as those of Prof. G. Gentile, of Pisa; Prof. A. Anile, of Naples; Dr. D. Camerini, Professor P. Carabellese, Prof. V. Cian, Prof. Paolo Orano, Prof. F. Momigliano, Avv. R. Ottolenghi, Prof. N. Checchia, Mrs. Teresa Fondi F. Mattani, Senator Chiapelli, Avv. A. Begey, Dr. Samuele Colombo. Amongst those who replied were Catholics of modernist views, Protestants, Protestant ministers, Jewish Rabbis, and masters in secondary schools.

The Riforma acquired new collaborators, amongst these being Prof. Paolo Orano, who has published numerous works dealing with historical, social, and religious questions, and is also a noted journalist. Raffaele Ottolenghi, a Jewish lawyer, author of three learned volumes on the origin of Christianity entitled, 'Voci d'Oriente,' and a contributor to some of the most important Italian periodicals, entrusted us with the publication of a book dedicated to the Unitarians of Italy which bears witness to the author's learning and religious fervour, and is an eloquent vindication of Israel's religious message to the world. This work, which contains about 600 pages, is entitled 'Farisei Antichi e Moderni' (Pharisees ancient and modern), and is on sale at a very low price, especially for these days.

Another inquiry into the probable effects of the war on the religious temper of the Italians—a continuation and completion of the earlier one—was announced in the March number of the Riforma, and will certainly be no less successful than its predecessor.

A revival of modernism has made itself felt of late, and some of the most noted modernists, following my example, show signs of applying to our Association and Review, and making use of it for their religious discussions, thus making common cause with a movement for the promotion of liberty which falls in so well with their programme. We may, however, regard this difficult time, which we trust may not be unduly prolonged, as a difficult test to which we have proved ourselves equal. Even though it has frustrated many of our hopes and plans, we trust that it may be found to have prepared many new and precious opportunities for the time when the great war will be a thing of the past, and with the vanishing of many fond illusions, the soul of man will turn eagerly towards teaching which can offer a firmer and more spiritual pacific foundation to our unfortunate European civilisation, now tottering and prostrate under the blows of an unparalleled disaster.

It may be that the Italians, whom a favourable sequence of events enabled to throw off almost too easily the political and spiritual yoke of centuries, stood in need of some great trial which should arouse them from their state of torpor, and impart fresh life to religious activity. The trial has come, and if we are to gauge the sacrifices of every kind which the war will yet ask of us by what it has already cost, it is to be hoped that the soul of the nation will prove as equal to the task of reconstruction before us as it has so far proved to the trial of to-day.

In the meantime we are preparing our programme of future work of which it would be premature to speak at present.

Romolo Murri.

SUPERMEN AND SUPERWOMEN.

"Dear ladies, I am one with you in heart."
Aristophanes.

In some of the upper circles of wisdom Nietzsche is the magic word to-day. He has applied to philosophy the popular method of "a penny plain and twopence coloured." And it has proved effective in recruiting supermen. They flock to the colours. The plain background of the classics painted with Prussian-blue and crimson-lake is most alluring.

I confess I am perturbed. I like Nietzsche. The eight volumes of his works which I possess are frequently in my hands. He is an immensely stimulating fellow. His criticisms are not only vastly entertaining, they are most exhilarating too. And though I am not given over much to living dangerously, very often after reading him I find myself cultivating quite a Malvolio vein—"I will be proud. I will read politic authors. I will wash off gross acquaintance. I will be strange, stout, in yellow stockings and cross-gartered." Of course, beside the great lion, my roarings are but those of a sucking dove. But my heart is good.

And yet I am perturbed. Notwithstanding his heroic cultivation of the aristocratic attitude, the Superman is vulgar, and an arrant snob. Though this enhances his value in the comedy of life, it dissipates his force. There are times when the Superman has the lonely, isolated splendour of a star, and moves in power and beauty with sublime Miltonic grandeur. I bow before the rebuke of this archangel. But Nietzsche has mixed him up with modern memories of Frederick the Great and Napoleon. Heroes both, perhaps,—certainly Frede rick. But a couple of Philistine rascals. These ugly elements stick out everywhere. Nietzsche's followers seem to delight in emphasising them, and they have degraded the Superman to very low levels. Perhaps we ought not to visit this on Nietzsche. I do, however, for he is utterly anarchic in advocating his doctrine of power. In destructive criticism, in poetic rhapsody, he is often superb; but in prose exposition he is wilful, crude, and grotesque. The jackal and hyena mingle with the nobler beast. The Superman is more Roman than Greek, more Prussian than Roman. And he is not the fine consummation of the natural man, but a feverish, exotic person. Such are so many of Nietzsche's disciples. Left to themselves they would innocently have cultivated a loud taste in ties or waistcoats, but the master has turned their heads, and they are mischievously cultivating a loud taste in minds.

These thoughts came to me in the watches of the night. Perhaps they were a nightmare in which the Superman was mixed up in a Zeppelin raid. I was reading the poems of Emily Brontë by the fire. And in the teeth of Nietzsche I felt that the women had got nearer to the truth. He is utterly contemptuous of women, and would found a blatant future on the triumph of the male animal. He appeals to heroic times. And yet behind Greek civilisation what splendid forms of woman there are. Mixed up with Roman history what dazzling feminine souls. Does not Prussia owe more than she has ever had the grace to acknowledge to her Sophias and Charlottes, and the incomparable Louisa? In the scorn of Antigone rings the voice of the whole sisterhood:—

That one who is mortal thus could over bear
The infallible unwritten laws of Heaven.
Not now or yesterday they have their being,
But everlastingly, and none can tell
The hour that saw their birth.

The only appreciation of the Brontës that I have found worth reading was written by a Frenchman. He shows how their genius gave the dumb tragedy of their lives an articulate beauty by the sheer force of its refinement and distinction. And the scene of the tragedy is a humble "interior," warmed and lighted by sisterly devotion. Here, amid homely duties, these three very perfect gentlewomen wove their wondrous spells. Their souls flashed far "on wings with a wind of desire," claimed frank comradeship with earth, ocean, air, and set the baldest prosaics tingling with romance and mystery. But only poverty could sunder them from home and one another. Only poverty could betray them to the garish world. Fame, at last, found them out, and two of them were brought to London shy and trembling. What a romance it is. Those incongruities, those fragilities, those quaintnesses, dear to the art of Sterne, or Keats, or Crabbe, are all needed here. Yes, and something more that Crabbe might have supplied, for a squalid horror was hidden in their home. Charlotte was able, by living longer, to do more than her sisters, and so has occupied the larger place. Anne is a pathetic figure—"auprès de ses sœurs elle a l'air un peu effacé." Her sisters set the pitch of living and writing. Anne wrote with facility. But the pitch of life and literature was beyond her. In other surroundings she might have lived a charming life and done charming work. She was too frail for such austerities, and perished. An Ismene trying to live up to an Antigone. The pathetic verses in which with calm resignation she looks back on hopes never fulfilled are worth volumes which the strong and resolute have filled with their cheap rant.

But of the three sisters Emily is the greatest. As my French writer says:—"Rare est le mot qu'on se répète tout bas." Badly dressed governesses, all the sisters move with individual distinction, but Emily stands out for ever on some lonely crag of those moors she loved. An exquisite, aloof creature, showing in her eyes and her eager figure the power of those silent spaces. She thrills with a fearful gladness out of doors, and at home her courage overawes the household. What killed her body was life to her mind. Without effort she rises to Nietzsche's tremendous doctrine, for she has drunk of the tragic cup of Dionysus, and has found a passionate joy. "Rien ne l'abat, presque rien ne l'attriste; elle est la reine de sa propre vie." And Emily Brontë has the secret of the spiritual. She lives on nature and reality, and utters their truth and power. She is never self-assertive. She is never in any pose. She is natural, like things in nature. And such things are always full of mystery. Complex things bother our ingenuity, but rarely disturb our souls. It is the simple things that do that. Amid the simple things of nature Emily Brontë moves like some virginal priestess. Hers is a holy communion from which she gets sacramental grace. Full of a peace which passes understanding she comes back to the duty nearest to her—to bake excellent bread and pies. Where is the cackle of the superman beside this exaltation of soul?

Emily Brontë is to be found in her poems. She says nothing which has not been said before, but she says it differently, for she just says it for herself. What a queenly step is here—

I'll walk where my own nature would be leading;
It vexes me to choose another guide;
Where the grey flocks in ferny glens are feeding,
Where the wild wind blows on the mountain side.

And in that mystical poem, "The Visionary," what proud restraint, what womanly secrecy, so different from the debauched humility of the religionist—

What I love shall come like visitant of air,
Safe in secret power from lurking human snare;
What loves me, no word of mine shall e'er betray,
Though for faith unstained my life must forfeit pay.
Burn then, little lamp, glimmer straight and clear—
Hush! a rustling wing stirs, methinks, the air!
He for whom I wait thus ever comes to me;
Strange Power! I trust thy might; trust thou my constancy.

So she lived with power and joy in that free spirit which moved in "all nature's million mysteries," and in sure and certain trust in that spirit she met death with proud courage:—

Well, let them fight for honour's breath
Or pleasure's shade pursue—
The dweller in the land of death
Is changed and careless too.

And, if their eyes should watch and weep
Till sorrow's source were dry,
She would not, in her tranquil sleep,
Return a single sigh!

Blow, west wind, by the lonely mound,
And murmur summer streams—
There is no need of other sound
To soothe my lady's dreams.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

Indian Thought, Past and Present. By R. W. Frazer, LL.B., C.E., &c. London: T. Fisher Unwin. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

"The war that has convulsed Western civilisation," says Mr. Frazer, in his introduction to a volume which will be cordially welcomed by the serious student of Indian affairs, "brings to India a message of peace. No longer can aspiring ambitions seek to plunge India into a chaos of desolation. India, assured of the justice inherent in the British Empire, will await the time when she will have fitted herself to take a part in the destinies to which her patient loyalty and national thought shall entitle her." It is with this thought in mind that he seeks to guide his readers through the tortuous mazes of religious philosophy summed up in modern Hinduism, and to demonstrate not only that the future of India is inseparably bound up with the profound conceptions of God and the Universe enshrined in her sacred literature, but that those conceptions are actually being supported, instead of undermined, by modern thinkers in the West who appear to have arrived at the same truths by totally different paths. From this standpoint it is possible to steer something like a straight course amidst the conflicting opinions to which the problem of this great country is giving rise, and to estimate at their true worth the efforts both of those who have sought to fetter her intellect to an "infallible" Vedic tradition, and those who have encouraged, in reckless disregard of consequences, a spirit of secularism which has already gone far to destroy some of the moral sanctions upon which her social system rests. We are witnessing a great quickening of the soul of humanity, and nowhere is it likely to have more far-reaching results than in the East, where the ideal of nationalism is seeking fresh interpretation in the light of catastrophic events which are ushering in a new era of civilisation for the world. What we have always to remember in dealing with Indian affairs is that the Indian mind is essentially religious, that the faith by which India lives is a vital factor in the daily experience of millions of her toilers of which the average Englishman—to whom religion is often a mere matter of Sunday observance, and not always that—has no conception; that the soul of India is ceaselessly trying, like a homing bird, to find its way back to the God who revealed himself to her ancient seers and mystics in the lonely forests or the waste places of the desert. Sometimes it has sought to rest in the idea that all phenomena is illusion; again it has found refuge in the thought that life is a continual pain and sorrow, from which escape can only be effected through the crushing out of desire; but, whatever expression has been given to it, the profound conviction has always been retained that the spirit in man has another and a fairer home, to which he belongs immortally, than the world it inhabits,—an existence, other than that of the flesh, which finds its perfect consummation when it becomes one with the Source of all being. He who knows this, the Upanishads teach, "does not grieve"; but "he who has not first turned away from his wickedness, who is not tranquil and subdued, or whose mind is not at rest, he can never attain the Self [God] even by knowledge." The subject which Mr. Frazer deals with is one, obviously, that many volumes could not begin to exhaust, but his brief survey of vast periods of history during which the great religious systems of India have been evolved is of absorbing interest, and can hardly fail to stimulate the desire for more detailed study of the process of their development in modern times. The last two chapters, all too short, on "The Position of Women in India" and "Present Indian Thought," give some indication of the intricate problems with which religious, educationtional, and political reformers will have to wrestle for a very long time to come.

Comparative Religion, its Adjuncts and Allies. By Louis Henry Jordan, B.D. (Oxford University Press, 12*s.* net), is a book not for the general reader but for the student. Its chief value is to be found in the critical bibliography of some five hundred books dealing with subjects like anthropology and ethnology, which Mr. Jordan regards as subsidiary to his own special study. The annotated summaries of works like 'The Golden Bough' and Reinach's 'Cultes, Mythes et Religions,' or the books of Cumont and Durkheim are very useful, and the elaborate index has been compiled with great attention to detail. Unfortunately Mr. Jordan has neglected the art of writing. His style is heavy and unpleasant, and the constant use of technical jargon like "comparativist," is a crime against good taste. Much learning is no excuse for such discourtesy to the English tongue, least of all when the subject is religion.

There is an abundance of pleasant fireside reading in Dr. G. H. Putnam's Memories of a Publisher, 1865–1915, and readers who enjoyed the earlier volume will be eager to turn to its successor (London, G. P. Putnam's, 9*s.* net). In addition to American topics it is flavoured with literary gossip about London authors and publishers, and reveals on almost every page the writer's broad-minded sympathies and his keen enjoyment of life. Mr. Putnam has long been an important link, both on the social and the intellectual side, between ourselves and the American mind; and he has recently deepened the obligation and increased our respect by his unswerving advocacy of the moral and political ideals for which we as a nation are fighting. The present volume contains a valuable and deeply interesting appendix on the European war, consisting of the letters from his pen which have appeared, chiefly in The New York Times. They are marked by argumentative force, directness of attack, and a good man's plain refusal to take refuge in moral neutrality where justice and honour are concerned.

In a Dictionary of the Apostolic Church (Edinburgh, T. &. T. Clark, Vol. I., 21*s.* net), Dr. Hastings has set his hands to one more book of reference, which seeks to make the paths of knowledge easy for the student and the preacher. It is intended to be supplementary to the 'Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels,' and deals with the apostolic writings and the history of the Church down to the end of the first century. Dr. Hastings has been successful in enlisting the help of a large group of distinguished scholars, though for obvious reasons the foreign names are less numerous than usual. Among the writers are Archdeacon Allen, the Archbishop of Dublin, Prof. Burkitt, Prof. Lake, Prof. Moffatt, and Canon Sanday. The dictionary is to be completed in two volumes. The present instalment carries it down to the word "Lystra."

HOME CAMP NOTES.

SEVERAL inquiries have been made as to whether the visits are intended only for camps in the London area. The wish of the Committee of the Association is that as far as possible visits should be paid to every camp where our men are to be met with. Already many districts north, south, and west have received some attention, and within the last week or two names have been sent in for camps from which I had only recently returned. Further opportunities, however, will arise, and, meanwhile, in some of these camps there are now men who will try to call upon newcomers whose names I am able to send on to them. It is not possible, of course, to print the names of the places which are next on the list ; but it would help me considerably if any alterations for camps in the eastern counties could be forwarded immediately, and any additions. There must be knowledge especially of many removals into one important district, and I shall be greatly obliged for information respecting the changes. It is a matter for the utmost satisfaction that, in addition to the lists from churches and schools, names are now being sent in from individual homes, and I need only add that they are welcome from every source, that the sooner they come and the bigger the numbers in which they come the better, the simpler the work will become, and the more complete the visitation that can be made.

My modest work has hitherto taken up a good deal of time through the lack of railway accommodation in many of these districts where the new camps are established. Long distances have had to be walked, over a hundred miles, for example, in one area alone. Meanwhile, in addition to officers and nurses and many soldiers, the representatives of every voluntary organisation were met with at every turn in swift motor cars, the representative of the Unitarian Association apparently being the only person having any considerable distance to travel afoot. In the course of a few days, however, this will be remedied, for, owing to the generosity of Mr. Charles Hawksley a cycle and a sidecar will be at my disposal.

This most useful gift, together with the list of donations resulting from the appeal which appeared recently in THE INQUIRER in aid of the Home Camps Social Work, will enable me to visit the men in the remoter neighbourhoods, and to carry these evidences of goodwill to a much larger number of our friends. May I be allowed to thank these generous donors, and to say that further help in the same direction will be most acceptable, and that the utmost care will be taken with its disbursement.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, April 18, the chair being taken at 4 o'clock by Dr. C. Hargrove, in the unavoidable absence of the President, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., who was detained at the House of Commons. There were present Miss Burkitt, Miss Tayler, Mr. A. S. Tayler, Mr. W. Spiller, Mr. T. P. Young, Major-General Wallace, Mr. Fellows Pearson, Mr. Ion Pritchard, and the Revs. W. G. Tarrant (Chairman of the Executive Committee), W. Wooding, V. D. Davis, J. A. Pearson, D. Delta Evans, the Rev. T. P. Spedding (Missionary Agent), and W. Copeland Bowie (Secretary).

The Minutes were read by Mr. Bowie, and the Report of the work of the Executive Committee, some extracts from which we hope to publish next week, was presented. Mr. Spedding briefly described the excellent work which he is doing in visiting the soldiers' camps in various parts of the country, details of which have already appeared in THE INQUIRER. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Report, said, that, in his opinion, in spite of the difficulties and perplexities which the war had brought upon them, the Association was still doing a great deal of work, and of all their activities none could give more satisfaction to those who were attached to the Association, and supremely attached to their country, than Mr. Spedding's work among the troops. When a young man of their body became a soldier he could not take up another religion as easily as he changed into khaki, and he would be unlikely to give up his own religion when he was engaged on a task that might mean his death, and would need, at anyrate, great powers of endurance. None of the religious services held in the camps were, however, such as he had been used to, and he was necessarily forced into an attitude of criticism and protest that was detrimental to true worship. It was to such men that Mr. Spedding had been able to make his appeal, and the results had been most satisfactory. It was work which required special qualities, and they all wished Mr. Spedding God speed in his labours. Dr. Hargrove then read several extracts from an interesting report by Signor Murri, describing the progress of the liberal religious movement in Italy, which we print in full on another page. A similar report had also come from Signor Conte, and it seemed to him, in reading the two, really extraordinary how much was being done by these men in spite of the great difficulties put in their way at the present time. Signor Murri's words ought to make them feel their fraternity with the Italians, not only as an allied nation, but, so far as this religious movement was concerned, as fellow Unitarians, though that was not the name they adopted in Italy.

The motion was seconded by Major-General Wallace, who said that although he had been a member of the Council for many years this was the first opportunity he had had of being present at one of its meetings owing to the fact that he had been much abroad. He paid a warm tribute to the Rev. W. C. Bowie for his work as Secretary, and referring to Mr. Spedding's camp visits, said that what soldiers wanted was a "straight man," and one with no pretence about him. As a matter of personal interest, he explained, that he had joined the Council as a member of the Church of England; old associations were often difficult to break, and he hoped others might be able to come in on the same terms.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant drew special attention to a matter which he regarded as of capital importance, namely, the result of the negotiations with the Baptist Union regarding the General Baptist (Unitarian) Chapels. The facts dealt with in the Report had been stated quite simply, and probably those who would read the Report afterwards would not realise fully the great significance of the mutual agreement which had been arrived at after many lengthy discussions, or the entire self-devotion with which the work had been undertaken by those to whom the matter was entrusted. The situation had been such that at any moment the congregations involved might have found themselves in the midst of troublesome and painful litigation. The present friendly agreement was binding upon all parties concerned, but it would ultimately have to be ratified by an Act of Parliament which it was impossible, of course, to obtain at the present time.

Mr. Bowie announced that Dr. Carpenter had consented to be nominated as President in succession to Mr. Brunner, and Mr. Montgomery, K.C. as Chairman of the Executive. In that capacity the Rev. W. G. Tarrant had been most unremitting in his labours for the Association, never being absent from a Committee Meeting unless it was absolutely unavoidable.

The preacher at the religious service in connection with the anniversary meetings in Whit-week will be the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, and the subject of the addresses to be delivered at the public meeting on Wednesday, June 14, is 'Abiding Things in a World of Conflict.'

HIGH PAVEMENT CHAPEL, NOTTINGHAM.

The new chancel fittings lately presented by Mr. Charles Hawksley to the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, replace the former pitch-pine screen which extended across the chancel steps, and the choir stalls, which were originally within the chancel, and were afterwards moved forward into the chapel for the greater convenience and comfort of the choir. Both in material and design these fittings were inferior to the architectural merits of the chapel itself, and the screen had the further drawback of obstructing part of the great Burne-Jones window as seen from the front section of the pews.

Those who know the chapel will recall how this immense window dominates the interior, and throws all the adjoining parts of it into deep shadow, while, at night, the clusters of powerful unscreened electric lights fixed to the front of the screen produced an equally dazzling effect. The problem was to replace the screen by something which should not obstruct the window and yet should be visible in the comparative darkness below it, and the solution was found in a metal chancel rail, less than five feet in height, massively designed and carried out in wrought iron and cast brass, by which the rather thin effect of beaten work is avoided. The decorative detail is based on the grape-vine, and all the metal is brought to a dull polish so as to catch and reflect the light as far as possible. An opening is left in the centre for access to the chancel, and the rail is seen from the pews partly above and partly in the space between the choir stalls.

These latter are carried out in English oak, and were designed to harmonise with the oak-work of the organ case, which already stood in the angle of the chancel and transept. The stalls on the organ side are backed by a panelled screen with a richly carved cornice of wild-rose design, and other parts of the stalls are decorated with pierced tracery and with vine and oak-leaf carving, in bold and high relief on account of the subdued light in which they are seen.

Two electric pendants of six lights each, corresponding in material and design with the chancel-rail, are hung from decorative brackets on the sides of the chancel arch, and the lamps are completely shaded from the congregation while throwing light downwards on to the rail and choir stalls. The designs were made by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A., and the metal work was carried out by the Artificers' Guild of London, and the choir stalls by Messrs. Hutch of Lancaster, who were responsible for the woodwork at Ullet Road Church, Liverpool, and in the chancel of Essex Church, Kensington.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

Dr. J. E. Carpenter is to be nominated as the new President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in succession to Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P. His freedom from college duties makes it possible for him to accept an office, in the discharge of which he will increase the obligations, if indeed that be possible, which our churches and ministers everywhere owe to him already. He will certainly have a strenuous time, if he does everything which he will be asked to do.

The preacher of the annual sermon at Whitsuntide will be the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans of Bury. Mr. Evans entered the ministry in 1889. After a short pastorate at Loughborough he settled at Kidderminster in 1890. In 1904 he removed to Bank Street Chapel, Bury. As a preacher he is better known in the north than in London. The service will be held in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

Last time the Association visited Hampstead for its annual service there was a pleasant gathering in the grounds adjoining the Chapel during the early part of the evening. There will be a general desire that this may be repeated. War-time should rightly reduce the expense of hospitality to a minimum, but it need not interfere with the greetings of friends and the beauty of a garden in June.

In common with other papers we have made special arrangements in connection with the Shakespeare tercentenary. On April 29 we shall publish an article by Dr. C. Hargrove on 'Shakespeare and National Life.' This will be followed by two others, 'Shakespearean Tragedy,' by the Rev. H. Gow, and 'Shakespearean Comedy,' by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor.

Meanwhile, may we call the attention of our readers to an excellent pamphlet on 'Shakespeare and Religoin,' by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, which has just been published at Essex Hall for a penny. Mr. Tarrant closes with the following happy touch:—"We seem to see him in his closing years a man of large and open-hearted ways, reverent toward God, courteous toward man, a lover of mercy, a believer in goodness, beauty, mirth, manliness. If to be Shakespeare's disciple is to grow Shakespearian after this manner, who would not be one."

Next week we shall publish a special article by Miss Evelyn Underhill (Mrs. Stuart Moore) entitled 'The Fight for Right Movement—a Call to Consecration.' Miss Underhill is widely known through her books on Mysticism. Her noble utterances since the outbreak of the war show how deeply she has penetrated into the heart of the truth which the mediæval mystics knew so well, that the vision of God depends not upon vague religious fancies or sentimental dreams, but upon vigour of conscience, obedience, and discipline.

Many of our readers who have visited the late Miss Lister at Upper Heath, Hampstead, will learn with genuine regret that the old house and the spacious garden, so rich in quaint literary associations, are to be sold. There is a good deal of fear that the estate may fall into the hands of the speculative builder, who will seize the opportunity of erecting palatial flats on one of the finest unoccupied sites near London. Hitherto Hampstead has been singularly fortunate in preserving its old houses and quaint corners from the hands of the destroyer. The Heath cannot be touched, but its value as a place of rest and recreation depends largely upon the beauty of its precincts.

The Fourteenth Vacation Term for Biblical Study will be held this year at Oxford from July 29 to August 12, the length of the term having been reduced from three weeks to a fortnight on account of the war. The Inaugural Address will be given by the Bishop of Oxford on 'The Priesthood of Christ,' and the following courses of four lectures have been promised: First week, 'The Book of Ezra and Nehemiah,' by Canon Box, St. John's College, Oxford; and 'Prayer in the Jewish and in the Christian Church,' by Dr. Oesterley, Jesus College, Cambridge. Second week:—'The Theology of the Priestly Portions of the Hexateuch and of the "Books of Chronicles,"' by Dr. Darwell Stone, Principal of Pusey House, Oxford,; and 'The Epistle to the Hebrews,' by the Rev. R. G. Parsons, Principal of Wells Theological College. Single lectures have also been promised by Dr. Sanday, Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, Oxford; Dr. Selbie, Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford; and Mr. C. C. J. Webb, M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford. Hebrew and Greek Testament Readings will be held throughout the fortnight. Full particulars will be supplied by the Secretary, Miss E. Lawder, 25, Halifax Road, Cambridge.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Hull.—Park Street Church, Hull, has suffered a heavy loss in the death of Mrs. Alfred Frost on the 6th inst. Born in our communion she had lived and worked for it all her days. No church ever had a more devoted member, a more loyal and active supporter. Regularly she occupied her accustomed seat at the Sunday services and enthusiastically identified herself with all the varied activities of our congregational life. Especially will she be remembered for the great interest she manifested in the "Women's Friendly," and for her devoted care of the old people of the Chamberlain Trust. They were "her women," and many now mourn the loss of one whose presence brought light and joy into homes too often dark and sad. Of a lovable disposition and the kindest heart, she possessed in unusual degree the capacity for making friends. Her chief concern was the happiness of her fellow creatures. Not only the church where she worshipped, but the city of Hull as a whole is poorer for her death.

Leeds, Holbeck.—On Saturday, April 8, a public welcome was given to the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, on his settlement as Minister of the Holbeck Unitarian Church. A number of friends from Mill Hill Chapel and Hunslet were present at the tea which preceded the meeting, including Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Miss Buckley, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas G. Westerman, Mr. Edward Hill, the Rev. Frank Coleman, Dr. S. F. Dufton, and Mrs. and Miss Metcalfe. There were also present several friends from Pudsey, in addition to Miss E. M. Slater, daughter of a former minister, and the Rev. J. S. Mathers, whose presence reminded older members of his father's association with Holbeck in early days. Mr. James Tempest, Chairman of the Church Committee, presided over the public meeting, and spoke very hopefully of the future, and of the necessity laid upon them all of supporting their new minister. Mr. H. Kitchen, Secretary, read a number of letters expressing regret at inability to attend, including one from the Rev. Nicol Cross, minister of Mill Hill Chapel, who is serving in the R.A.M.C. On behalf of the Sunday School, Mr. B. Pearson and Mr. W. B. Holgate, superintendents, extended a warm welcome to Mr. Smith. Dr. Moore, the Church Treasurer, and Miss Kitchen also spoke, the latter offering a special welcome to Mrs. Smith from the ladies of the congregation. The Rev. Frank Coleman voiced the greetings of the local ministers; and Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, in a cordial speech, referred to the critical times which faced them. They rejoiced in their young men and were the better for their noble spirit of self-sacrifice. There would be a truer Christian faith, a better and higher humanity, and they must keep their places warm for those who would return. The Rev. Joshua Lord, on behalf of the Yorkshire Union, the Rev. J. S. Mathers, and the Rev. J. Wolfendale (Wesleyan) also spoke. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith thanked those present for their warm welcome, and appealed to the members to make their fellowship real and lasting. There is a strong determination to make the Holbeck Chapel the centre of more vigorous and increasing life in spite of the falling off during recent years, and the meeting was marked by a spirit of hopefulness and enthusiasm which is a happy augury of future effort.

London (Wandsworth). — A crowded audience attended a concert on the 14th inst., given on behalf of the funds of the Ladies' Working Party, which provides garments for wounded Belgian soldiers and for our London poor. An excellent programme was performed by the following Belgian artistes: Mlles. Germaine Jean, Madeleine Jean, Georgette Jean, Louise Cornet, Theresa de Larcy, and Monsieur. F. Bucken de Courcy; and Mr. A. W. Pearce contributed organ music. At the close the Belgian and British national anthems were sung. The concert, which was arranged by Miss Collings and Mrs. Pearce, was in all respects a great success.

North Cheshire District.—The Annual Conversazione of the Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at Stockport on Saturday last. The attendance was greatly interfered with by Jubilee Celebrations at Stalybridge on the same day. A meeting of the Committee was held in the afternoon for the transaction of business. After tea the President (Mr. F. Hepworth) presided over an attendance of about seventy teachers and friends. Mr. J. Wigley attended on behalf of the Manchester District Sunday School Association and delivered an address on the present and future needs for the work of Sunday school teachers.

Oldbury.—The Monthly Meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and Neighbouring Counties was held at Unity Church, Oldbury, on Monday, April 10, when the local minister, the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, presided. A very large number of the members met to hear a lecture by Dr. G. Rendel Harris on 'God and the Soul in the Songs of Tagore.' Several visitors were present, viz.: the Revs. G. H. Camburn (Wesleyan), and E. Allport (Primitive Methodist), representing the Oldbury Free Church Ministers' Fraternal, the Rev. — Henderson (Wesleyan) of Cradley, and Dr. Brash of Handsworth. The lecture was listened to with great appreciation, and in the discussion the Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, L. Clare, F. A. Homer and S. R. Gibbon took part. The chairman expressed the gratitude of all present for the lecture. Tea, to which the ministers' wives and local friends had been invited, then followed, and at 6.45 a well-attended service was held in the church, the preacher being the Rev. Laurence Clare, of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

Shakespeare's England.

In an interesting paper on 'The England of Shakespeare,' given to the Royal Society of Arts by Mr. P. H. Ditchfield, the well-known antiquarian, a description was given of the aspects of the country as it was in the poet's time. England was then a land of ruins. "Scattered over the country were the ruins of the great abbeys, priories, nunneries, and other monastic buildings. When Shakespeare was a young man, scarcely fifty years had elapsed since these magnificent piles had been shorn of their glory, some converted into dwelling-houses for the rich men who had profited by their dissolution, others with lead torn from their roofs, faced stone stripped from the thin walls, pictures of desolation and of the merciless fury of the iconoclast."

On the other hand Shakespeare's age was an age of building, an age that gave birth to Hatfield, Longleat, Audley End, Chatsworth, Hardwick, and many other famous English seats. It was an age of great architects, such as John Thorpe (whose designs may be studied in the Soane Museum), Bernard Adams, Bradshaw, and Huntingdon Smith. "All the country squires, the newly enriched city merchants, or the nouveaux riches who had enriched themselves with the spoils of the monasteries, or been blown by lucky gales into the sunshine of Court favour—all these were building: some great palaces such as Wollaton, or Burghley House, or Longleat, others those charming manor houses that stud the countryside, set in a framework of dark trees in sequestered villages and obscure hamlets."

Shakespeare and Oxford.

The Curators of the Bodleian Library have given permission for a Shakespeare Tercentenary Exhibition to be held in the library opening on April 24 (Easter Monday). The Shakespearian collection there is the largest in the Empire, except that at the British Museum. The arrangements have been made by the staff of the library, aided by a consultative committee including Archdeacon Hutton, of St. John's, Sir Sidney Lee of Balliol, and Sir Walter Raleigh of Magdalen, and there will be no ceremony except, perhaps, a short speech or so. The exhibits will include some early quartos, several folio editions, also a selection of later editions and miscellaneous works. Among the manuscripts are several autographs of Shakespeare, several contemporary records of plays of Shakespeare being acted, and Aubrey's Notes, the first biography of Shakespeare. There will be two catalogues, one priced at 6*d*., the other at 5*s*. Sir Sidney Lee will contribute a Preface, and Archdeacon Hutton an essay on 'Shakespeare and Oxford.'

There is a prospect of a number of Rossetti's pictures, including ten oil paintings and ten water-colours and drawings, nearly all painted in Rossetti's finest period, and originally collected by Mr. George Rae of Liverpool, becoming the possession of the nation. A war valuation has been put on the pictures, which the trustees of the Rae family will probably accept, and Mr. Arthur Du Cros, M.P. for Hastings, is willing to contribute about £3,000 in order to make the purchase possible. Mr. Sargent regards this as a unique opportunity for the nation to acquire some of Rossetti's work of the earliest period, which all artists agree in thinking is by far the best, although the latter is still the most generally known. The pictures include 'The Beloved,' 'Monna Vanna,' and 'The Blue Closet,' of which Maeterlinck has said that, since seeing it many years ago, he has been haunted by it.

The Italian Red Star.

In addition to his work for the Italian Blue Cross, Mr. Leonard Hawksley, according to a letter which he has written to The Animal's Friend, is taking up an entirely new line of work at the suggestion of the Ministry of War, namely, first aid to wounded horses on the battlefield, for which no organisation exists at present in the Italian Army. It is proposed to have about a dozen first aid posts on the various battlefields, along the various Italian fronts, about a mile and a half from the trenches; each post will be manned by two vets., a farrier, four grooms, and four soldiers. The Government will provide mules and carts for conveying food, water, &c., also tents, uniforms, food, and water for men and beasts, and a horse for every person employed; the salaries and wages, surgical appliances, drugs and dressings will have to be supplied by other means. Lord Astor has already given £3,000 for the maintenance of a hospital for three hundred wounded horses within twelve miles of the trenches, and Mr. Hawksley hopes that the generosity of other friends of animals in England will allow the new work to be started. The name of the Red Star has been adopted because that is the emblem of the International Alliance which was founded at Geneva last year for helping animals on the field of battle.

Medical College for Women at Delhi.

The Lady Hardinge Medical College for Women which was opened on February 18 is the outcome of a woman's concern for the welfare of women, and constitutes a truly magnificent memorial of the Viceroy's late wife which ought to do much to stimulate the growth of sympathy between India and this country. The College is admirably equipped, and has accommodation for one hundred students, while the hospital has one hundred and fifty beds, and can house twenty-five fully trained nurses and the same number of probationers. The women professors will occupy three bungalows, and as a special feature of the scheme is the division of the hospital into separate units, each with its own wards and its own central building for administration purposes, each professor will have her separate and complete clinic, with clinical laboratory, demonstration, and consulting rooms. Both Hospital and Training School are to be conducted on strictly purdah lines, every possible attention being paid to considerations of religion and caste. The hostels have separate blocks for Christian, Hindu, Mohammedan, Sikh, and Parsee students, with separate kitchens and dining-rooms, and it will thus be possible for clever Indian girls to take up a medical career without the danger of breaking caste in mixed classes at general colleges, or the need of coming to England for their training.

The Protection of Birds.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds publishes an encouraging annual report, though its activities, especially in regard to promoting legislation, have necessarily been curtailed by the war. The plumage trade, we are glad to say, is largely dormant, but "ospreys" and Bird of Paradise plumes are still worn a good deal by fashionable women—a piece of senseless extravagance which seems particularly heartless at the present time. It is pleasant to record that the grave misgivings with which the Society's Watchers set about their work in the spring of 1915, owing to the fact that so many of the coast areas where they are stationed had been either taken over by the War Office, or were contiguous to great camps of soldiers, have been completely dissipated. In no district has there been complaint of soldiers interfering with the birds; on the contrary their presence made for protection. From the extensive Dungeness area, where the breeding season was wholly successful, one of the Watchers wrote: "Some of the men I met are quite interested, and like to watch the birds and to hear their history." An increase of Norfolk Plover has been especially noted in this district, and the Nightjar has nested for the first time on the sand.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE publish to-day the first list of contributions from the Sunday Schools towards the Recreation Hut for the Belgian Army. We do so with much pleasure and gratitude. It will encourage others to send in their gifts quickly and to make their generosity worthy of the cause in which it is offered. Sunday Schools above most places ought to foster the spirit of unselfishness and thoughtful care for others, and this is one of the ways in which they can take upon themselves some of the common burden and help the sore need of the hour. We on our side will do our best to make it known among the soldiers who use the Hut that it is a gift of sympathy and admiration to them from hundreds of children, who have given their pence in order to make them comfortable and happy. We are sure that will be a pleasant thought to them as they remember their own homes and the desolate villages of Belgium. Many of them have not seen their children since the beginning of the war.

WE have another request, and it is one which we hope will make a strong appeal to the boys among our readers and any who are fond of sport and open air life. We have received several letters lately from the Belgian Convalescent Depots in France telling us how terribly short they are of games. The men who are able to get into the open air have nothing to do and time often hangs very heavily on their hands. They would like footballs or croquet or bowls, in fact anything which will help them to have a pleasant time. We can also do with a great many more indoor games for the Hospitals, especially dominoes, draughts, and packs of cards. We have sent hundreds out already, but they get lost and worn out, and the cry is still for more. These are little things and are easily supplied with a little spare pocket-money, but we know from personal observation how much they mean. A hospital well supplied with games and occupations loses its dreariness and becomes a comparatively happy place. It takes so little to make these brave men contented and ready to face danger again as soon as they are well.

TOMORROW is to be Shakespeare Sunday, and in most churches in the country there will be some form of commemoration. It will be above all an act of national thanksgiving for the enlargement of mind and the enrichment of life and character which we owe to his influence. Like the sun and the rain there is something impartial in this gift. It belongs equally to us all. In the presence of Shakespeare the trappings of rank and class lose most of their significance. He weaves his magic spells for all who have ever looked into their own hearts or watched the comedy of human existence with laughter and tears.

AT the same time he is an intensely national poet. He understood English life and he loved it. No one has pierced to the secret of the moral strength of English character with more unerring instinct than he, and at the same time none has been more conscious of its foibles and its faults. He loved his countrymen too well for captious blame or fulsome praise. He drew them exactly as they were, and just because he saw them so truly he loved them with passionate admiration. As Swinburne has pointed out in one of the finest passages of his 'Study of Shakespeare,' his patriotism was too national to be provincial. His "honourable and righteous judgment" never sought to embellish, to degrade, or to falsify.

> His typical English hero or historic protagonist is a man of their type who founded and built up the empire of England in India; a hero after the future pattern of Hastings and of Clive; not less daringly sagacious and not more delicately scrupulous, not less indomitable or more impeccable than they. A type by no means immaculate, a creature not at all too bright and good for human nature's daily food in times of mercantile or military enterprise; no whit more if no whit less excellent and radiant than reality. Amica Britannia, sed magis amica veritas. The master poet of England—all Englishmen may reasonably and honourably be proud of it—has not two weights and two measures for friend and foe.

WE have heard some expressions of regret that the Shakespeare Tercentenary should have occurred at a time when the national mind is preoccupied with the war. It is a feeling which we do not share. Doubtless our ceremonies are shorn of some of their pomp, and in days of leisure we might have listened to more stately eulogies; but would our spirits have brought as noble an offering as now, when our sons are giving their lives for their country, and the hearts of all of us are aflame with a type of patriotism which may with all fitness be called Shakespearian, for it is not vain boastfulness, but simple dedication of ourselves to the high ends for which God created "his Englishmen"?

Tuesday was a solemn and glorious anniversary. Two thousand Australian and New Zealand troops, all of them men who have had experience of battle and wounds, marched to Westminster Abbey, where at a service of commemoration, they thanked God for their brave comrades who fell in Gallipoli. In many respects it was London's proudest day since the beginning of the war. The tens of thousands of people in the streets were there to applaud deeds of matchless heroism; but they were also swayed by a sense of kinship and intimate political union with the lands beyond the seas, which is going to play a larger part than most of us have yet dreamed in shaping the future of the world.

At the luncheon which was given to the men after the service, Mr. Hughes, the Prime Minister of Australia, made a speech of lofty and moving eloquence. It seems to us not unworthy to take its place among the immortal panegyrics which have been spoken over the graves of soldiers.

> Soldiers [he said], your deeds have won you a place in the Temple of the Immortals. The world has hailed you as heroes. Your comrades of the British Army have claimed you as brothers-in-arms, and the citizens of the Empire are proud to call you kinsmen. But to your Australian and New Zealand fellow-citizens, to your mothers, fathers, brothers, and friends who know and love you, your glorious valour meant much more than to all others. On its shining wings we were lifted up to heights we had never seen; you taught us truths we never knew; you inspired us to a newer and better and nobler concept of life. You have covered yourselves with the glory that does not fade, your names will be handed down in your own native land and be as household words. The deathless story of the Gallipoli campaign will be sung in immortal verse inspiring us and generations of Australians and New Zealanders yet unborn, with pride of race, courage, tenacity of purpose, endurance, and that casting out of fear without which men, though boasting themselves free, are but wretched slaves. But above all these things your deeds teach us that through self-sacrifice alone can men or nations be saved. Not contempt of death even in its most awful forms, nor endurance, nor dash, nor resource, not all these things would have sufficed the men of Anzac had the divine spirit of self-sacrifice been lacking. From this springs that sublime heroism which walks into the jaws of death to save a comrade, this sends men as went the 8th Light Horse to certain death, believing that through their deaths victory might be achieved and their country saved. It is upon this foundation of self-sacrifice that true patriotism rests. And, since it has evoked this pure and noble spirit, who shall say that this dreadful war is wholly an evil? Into a world saturated with a lust of material things which had elevated self into a deity, which had made wealth the standard of greatness, comes the sweet, purifying breath of self-sacrifice. I feel glad that we have been privileged to meet here today to commemorate those glorious deeds by which you proved to the world that Australasia had put on the toga of manhood and thought all things, even life itself, as dross when your country and your liberties were in danger.

There is a great deal to be said in favour of an occasional secret session of Parliament during the progress of a great war. Ministers ought to be able to take their fellow-members into their confidence and to explain to them why they ask for their firm support for exceptional measures, without having to weigh the effect of every word upon the public mind or the foreign press. At the present moment a secret session is also a wholesome reminder of the danger to the public interest involved in a campaign of rumour and conjecture about the opinions and intentions of ministers. It is no part of the business of the Press, indeed, we should have thought it was contrary to its honourable traditions, to try to ferret out secrets and to sow suspicion. There has been some leakage of Cabinet secrets lately to the grave detriment of the country. It must be stopped with a firm hand if confidence is not to be destroyed.

The Government Policy in regard to recruiting was explained to the House of Commons sitting in secret session on Tuesday. It is announced that 50,000 additional men will be required by May 27, and if they are not obtained by voluntary enlistment from amongst the unattested married men, then the Government will forthwith ask Parliament for compulsory powers. Further, if 15,000 men have not been secured in any week after May 27 by voluntary enlistment the same course will be taken. These arrangements are to hold good until 200,000 unattested men have been obtained. In addition it is proposed to bring all youths who were under 18 on August 15 last under the terms of the Military Service Act as they reach that age. There is also a scheme for affording financial relief to men who join the army in cases where such relief is clearly reasonable and necessary.

There will no doubt be a good deal of criticism of these proposals in some quarters. With the people who wish to weaken the army and bring about a collapse of the war it is unnecessary to deal. They are few in number, feeble in influence and quite impervious to argument. But there are others who are alarmed on account of the interference with industry, and still cling to the belief that we could get all the men we need by voluntary recruiting, if only the right methods were adopted. Here we are on the ground not of principle but of political judgment, and it would be very rash for the ordinary civilian, even when he is backed by his favourite newspaper, to set his own preference against the considered opinion of responsible ministers. Our business is to finish the war as quickly and effectively as possible, and to take all the necessary steps to that end. Anything else would be national folly and wickedness. The surrender of some of our personal liberties for a season is a small price to pay for the freedom of the future. It is a case where brave and unselfish men have no choice but to obey.

The outbreak in Dublin is a deplorable affair. So far as the loss of life is concerned it has not gone beyond the proportions of a riot. Unfortunately it has succeeded in impressing the public mind on the spectacular side and will make rigorous measures against the fanatical Sinn Feiners necessary. There is also some danger that it will arouse anti-Irish feeling among people whose knowledge of Irish life and sympathy with Irish difficulties have never been very strong. The fine record of the Irish regiments in France, and the splendid and unswerving support which Mr. John Redmond has given to the cause of the Allies, should convince all but the most stubborn prejudice that there is no connection between the small anti-English gang at Liberty Hall and the Nationalist Party in the House of Commons. A Sinn Feiner would rather show charity to Sir Edward Carson than to Mr. Redmond.

Sir Roger Casement is a man of whom we had hoped to speak always with respect even when we differed most acutely from him, for his investigations into the Putumayo atrocities were of signal service to humanity. But no past record can palliate his present crime, which strikes us as particularly mean, cowardly and treacherous. He has accepted the pay, the honourable title and the official pension of this country, and then he seeks to stab her. He has also behaved towards his own misguided friends with criminal weakness and betrayed them into disaster. Such things can never be forgotten and they are past human forgiveness. We hope that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle was right when he said that Casement was mad.

A CALL TO CONSECRATION.

By Miss Evelyn Underhill.

The promoters of the Fight for Right Movement are often asked, What is the practical aim of their Association, what special need it is designed to meet. Its critics—and like all vital things, it has its critics—rightly feel that it must justify its existence before it demands their support. Perhaps the best answer to them is this: That its object is the correlation of patriotic thought and feeling with patriotic act; and that this correlation has become an essential factor in the successful prosecution of the war. On the one hand this Movement offers the thinker—whose special gifts should now be sources of energy and inspiration to those working, planning, and fighting for the freedom of the world—an opportunity of bringing those special gifts into action, mobilising them in the service of the race. On the other hand it seeks, with the help of these thinkers and of those who possess the power of expression, to offer men and women of action a mental and spiritual basis for their patriotic activities.

Man, that strange composite creature, can only do his best when all his faculties—spirit, mind, and feeling, as well as physical power—are brought to bear on the matter in hand; when the call to endeavour is heard and answered, not by reason or passion alone, but by both. He will do much and vividly, it is true, under the spell of unreasoning emotion; whether that emotion be religious, patriotic, or personal. He may do well and accurately that which he understands, but does not feel. But if he is to do both intensely and efficiently—not merely rush on a forlorn hope or invent a military machine, but plan and inspire the stress of a great campaign, endure the dull weight of a continued sacrifice for ideal ends—then, both heart and mind must be stimulated and enlightened; he must have both knowledge and love. Then only does the will, the cutting point of human personality come to its full power.

The application of this truth to our national life is obvious. The nation, too, must both warmly feel and clearly understand its part in the war if it is to rise to its full height, put forth all the strength of which it is capable, respond to the demand which events now make upon the corporate and the individual life. That demand may be summed up in one word: Consecration. A total consecration of England's heart mind and will to the one transcendent cause of rightness. The work which each citizen does for his country, the sorrows, privations, and restrictions which he endures for his country, and the burden, stress, and sacrifice which our country endures for the world—these must be inspired from within, not merely called forth from without, if they are to avail. Therefore, the thinking and feeling faculties of the social body—those elements in it which have clarity of reason, insight, ardour, faith—have now a great office to perform in the heightening of the national spirit, the subtle guidance of the national life. They must share this insight and this ardour with their fellow men, busied and wearied perhaps, with practical labours which leave small leisure for thought. Thus their vision and their passion find an opportunity of insertion into life, and may inspire deeds which the thinker and the seer are themselves unable to perform. "The wise bee," said an old mystic, "roams not for its own pleasure, but brings back to the community of its fellows the honey and wax it has sought without, and therefrom gives them sweetness and light." Such is the office of the thinker or the artist in the community of his fellow men.

Now the Fight for Right Movement seeks to bind together in one association, dedicated to the cause of freedom and rightness, all those capable of giving sweetness and light to the nation, and all those capable of receiving and profiting by it. Its office on the one hand is to enlighten, increase, and sustain our patriotic ardour; on the other hand, to set that patriotic ardour to work—to link, as it were, the flowers of thought and vision with the plain and useful labours of the hive. Our sense of the connection between national ideal and national act, of the spiritual goods for which we are fighting, the spiritual beauty behind the horrors we endure, tends to wane with the slow progress of the war; yet nothing is more essential to the real triumph of our cause than the increase and continuance of this high faith as the ruling passion of the English soul. When future historians come to reckon the losses and gains of the war, it will not be by the number of our dead, nor by the destruction of our wealth, but by the survival of this faith—its success in saving those things for which it struggles—that they will measure our true victory or defeat.

There are two directions in which this faith must express itself, if it is truly to redeem the social body, quicken it for the work it has in hand. First, it must help us to refuse all base thoughts of fear, malice, greed, revenge. Next, it must inspire in us a glad acceptance of self-sacrifice. Not only that great and perfect sacrifice which renders up its life; but the smaller, more lingering, less impressive renunciation of habits, privileges, preferences, and comforts, which the civilian is now called upon to bear. We know how willingly our sailors and soldiers make the greater sacrifice. Our part, if we would be united with them in spirit, is to make the humbler offering which is asked of us with the same zest, the same cheerful simplicity of heart: seizing this grand opportunity of self-consecration to the common lot.

We need not suppose, however, that this consecration to the common lot must involve anything very grand or sensational. For most of us the war can only mean the willing or unwilling endurance of a succession of wearing anxieties, irritating restrictions, worrying duties and privations. It means, for instance, that we must use our brains, and use them hard, in the endeavour to understand the economic problem. It means that we must act on that uncomfortable knowledge. It means that every housewife must take the interests of England with her into the kitchen in the morning; where, perhaps, an unfriendly neutral in the person of the cook awaits her diplomatic conversation. It means eking out the meat, saving the sugar, making the meat go further, taking a new interest in the soda and the soap. It means fighting our country's battle outside every shop we should like to enter and inside every shop we are obliged to enter. It means that we must travel as little as we can, use no more coal and electric light than we really need. It means old clothes. It means looking upon every penny as a munition of war, to be used to the best advantage. It means working at any job that we can get, however dull and apparently unworthy of our brilliant intellects, steadily and obediently; remembering that we, too, are in the ranks. Beyond this, it means that we must recollect the terrific power of words, the responsibility of all who use them; and refuse to repeat amusing but discreditable tales about those in authority, gloomy prophecies about the future, or any other rumour or scandal likely to injure the national morale. Above all, it means that we must remember the transcendent power of thought; and realise that faith, hope, and charity are now patriotic as well as theological virtues.

The promoters of the Fight for Right Movement are seeking, in various ways, to keep up the national spirit to those levels of enthusiasm and endurance at which alone such an ordering and consecration of life becomes possible. Only when such consecration is accepted by every citizen, and extravagance, idleness, and pessimism are recognised forms of treason, will England be doing her best to win the war. The obligation and responsibility are laid upon each one of us; here none are exempt, and none can say that opportunity of service is denied them. The noble sentiments which we take so easily upon our lips must become the controlling influences of our lives; and the interest of our country, in small things as in great, be the first interest of each one of her people. To accept and act upon this principle, entering thus upon that life of discipline and devotion which the service of God has always demanded, and which the true service of the state no less demands, is to give another soldier to the ranks of the Allied armies; and therefore another soldier to the struggle for the triumph of Right.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war,
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall
Or as a moat defensive to a house,
Against the envy of less happier lands,
This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England,
This nurse, this teeming womb of royal kings,
Fear'd by their breed and famous by their birth,
Renownèd for their deeds as far from home,
For Christian service and true chivalry,
As is the sepulchre in stubborn Jewry
Of the world's ransom, blessèd Mary's Son.

Shakespeare.

SHAKESPEARE'S PHILIP FAULCONBRIDGE.

Far beyond the reach of any but his maker's hand is the pattern of a perfect English warrior, set once for all before the eyes of all ages in the figure of the noble Bastard. The national side of Shakespeare's genius, the heroic vein of patriotism that runs like a thread of living fire through the world-wide range of his omnipresent spirit, has never, to my thinking, found vent or expression to such glorious purpose as here. Not even in Hotspur or Prince Hal has he mixed with more godlike sleight of hand all the lighter and graver good qualities of the national character, or compounded of them all so lovable a nature as this. In those others we admire and enjoy the same bright fiery temper of soul, the same buoyant and fearless mastery of fate or fortune, the same gladness and glory of life made lovely with all the labour and laughter of its full fresh days; but no quality of theirs binds our heart to them as they are bound to Philip—not by his loyal valour, his keen young wit, his kindliness, constancy, readiness of service as swift and sure in the day of his master's bitterest shame and shamefullest trouble as in the blithest hour of battle and that first good fight which won back his father's spoils from his father's slayer; but more than all these, for that lightning of divine rage and pity, and tenderness that speaks in thunder and indignation that makes fire of all its tears, in the horror of great compassion which falls on him, the tempest and storm of a beautiful and godlike anger which shakes his strength of spirit and bows his high heart down at sight of Arthur dead. Being thus, as he is, the English master-work of Shakespeare's hand, we may well accept him as the best man known to us that England ever made; the hero that Nelson must have been had he never come too near Naples. Swinburne.

We entreat thy mercy, O Lord, for our brethren and sisters from the East unto the West, that they also in their several places may pray for us. We pray also for the unity of the Churches; for the sick and feeble, for captives, for penitents, for labourers; for travellers by land or water; for those who give alms. We entreat thy mercy also, O Lord, for the spirits of our dear departed ones, that Thou wouldest grant to them, and to all who sleep in Thee, a place of rest and refreshment. Amen.

OUR SHAKESPEARE.

It is good and pleasant "for brethren to dwell together in unity," and even now, when the lessons taught by Treitschke, "the supreme educator" of our German kinsmen, are bearing their bitter fruit, and Britain has become "odious and contemptible in the eyes of those who heard him with enthusiasm and read his books as a gospel," even now, when the two nations are spending all their resources of mind and muscle to work each other's hurt, it is good and pleasant that the years, which come and go without regard for mortal wishes and passions, should have brought us together into a "Field of the Cloth of Gold," where we must needs make common cause in celebration of the greatest of dramatists, who is ours and is all men's.

We can surely afford to spare some little sympathy for Germans who, from the beginning of the war, foresaw the dilemma in which it would place them. Forego all participation in the Shakespeare Tercentenary which would fall so inopportunely in the midst of war? Refuse to join in the world's homage to him, "the infinite wealth and grandeur of whose genius," their own Goethe told them "had exhausted the whole of human nature, in all its tendencies, in its heights and depths, and left for the after-comer nothing more to do"? Treat as of no account in time of temporary turmoil, him whose works they boasted to have first fully understood and taught the world to recognise as of supreme worth? Impossible! Associate themselves with Shakespeare's decadent countrymen, anæmic traitors to the great cause of Teutonic supremacy on the earth, Allies of the despised Latin and Slav races? Impossible that, too!

With German stolidity they hacked a way between the horns. Had not their Chancellor set them an example when the choice was between observing an obligation or losing an advantage? In this case, too, "bitter necessity" compelled. Shakespeare must be duly honoured if only to maintain the honour of his numerous German worshippers; yet no Englishman could be acknowledged worthy of such tribute as was his due. By a harmless act of brigandage the situation was saved. Belgium had been annexed by blood and iron, Shakespeare should be annexed too, and the claim, made by right of appreciating him as we were said to have failed to do, was sufficient. There is no arguing such a case, much less fighting against it. Rather is it to be accepted by us as a most welcome compliment, though how he, for whom it is intended, would relish it is another question.

Accordingly from the Leipzig stage was annexation proclaimed in October, 1914, by a Prologue, which, with few alterations, might have applied if the occasion had been a grand performance in the presence of King and Kaiser, met in a day's truce for Shakespeare's sake; the Royal cousins both proudly conscious of the fullest achievement of Teutonic genius in the man to whom both laid loving claim and both paid lowliest homage, for that

Near as man can climb
To Godhead, he won godhead by his works.

Alas! Herr Hardt of Weimar was otherwise minded, and proceeded "in solemn earnest" to proclaim our Shakespeare henceforth and of his own free will—a German:—

This England of the present
Is so contrarious to his acts and feelings,
Yea, so abhorred of his pure majesty
And the proud spirit of his free-born being
That he doth find himself quite homeless there,
A fugitive he seeks his second home,
This Germany, that loves him most of all,
To whom before all others he gives thanks,
And says: Thou wonderful and noble land
Remain thou Shakespeare's one and only home,
So that he wander not, uncomprehended,
Without a shelter in the barren world.

Yes, Germany has done great things for Shakespeare, and we are proud that literary princes of another tongue should pay tribute, the noblest, to our King of Poets, and gratefully we acknowledge their homage. I find in notes of a lecture of forty years ago, that I dwelt upon the fact that it is to German authors we are indebted for an appreciation of Shakespeare higher than we English had reached hitherto, and I cannot go back upon the statement because we are now at war with those we then honoured as our fellow-students, and our teachers have become our enemies. Nevertheless, it is to be remembered that throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries when, as yet, Germany had no great literature of her own (such as there was, "it could not long awe me or occupy my attention," says Goethe, "It was only potatoes we could provide for the silver dishes he gave us, filled by him with golden apples.") England knew and appraised at high worth her greatest among great poets, her Mont Blanc (to quote the German poet philosopher again) among its immense neighbours, the Jungfrau, the Eiger, the Wetterhorn, which stand for Ben Jonson and Marlowe, and Beaumont and Fletcher, and the other great Elizabethans; and Milton it was who told men that Shakespeare's "livelong monument" was self-built and always living, in that it was fashioned out of "the wonder and astonishment" of his English readers, renewed in every generation.

Yet, not this nor aught which may be quoted from English writers before last century reaches to the magnificent eulogy of Walter Savage Landor:—

In poetry there is but one supreme,
Tho' there are many angels round his throne,
Mighty and beauteous, while his face is hid.

For this our thanks are due to German professors and actors who have so set forth his plays as to make German audiences and managers appreciate them more highly than we are apt to do, and help students among us to understand them better and realise their surpassing merit.

While it would be absurd to take seriously this attempt to rob England of her Shakespeare and Shakespeare of his England, it does concern us to ask in all earnestness—this man, whose works are the pride and crown of a national literature second to no other ancient or modern, who is ours by birth and descent, by bringing up and language and habit, ours in life and in death, is he ours by will and love? Or have we any reason to suspect that if living now he would deny his native land, and with Houston Chamberlain elect to be a German?

It is not legitimate to answer this question or any other respecting Shakespeare's inner or even outer life, by a recital of passages from his works, for the reason which his latest biographer gives against the illusion of personal confessions even in the sonnets. "With this key Shakespeare unlocked his heart," wrote Wordsworth, to which Browning replied, "Did Shakespeare? If so the less Shakespeare he"—the less consummate dramatist, the less capable of becoming the character for whom he spoke, the less unapproachable his "affluence in dramatic instinct and invention which enabled him to identify himself with every phase of human emotion." So we may not assume that our poet put into the mouth of the dying Gaunt in Richard II. just what he himself thought and felt, deliberately through his lips unlocked for the groundlings heart full of love for

This land of such dear souls, this dear, dear land, though we might, perhaps, claim that he speaks through the impersonal chorus in 'Henry V':—

O, England! model to thy inward greatness,
Like little body with a mighty heart,
What mightest thou do, that honour would (have) thee do,
Were all thy children kind and natural.

And his very own must be the oft-quoted words which end the play, and impress upon the audience the lesson of King John:—

This England never did, nor never shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror,
But when it first did help to wound herself.

But Gaunt's words have exceptional significance as the utterance of "a prophet new inspired," and it is noteworthy that they are spoken not on such a day as when

London doth pour out her citizens (to)
Go forth and fetch their conquering Cæsar in.

But when England was at its lowest and
She that was wont to conquer others,
Had made a shameful conquest of herself.

It was then that Gaunt expressed his love, his devotion, his admiration, his willingness to die for her:—

Ah, would the scandal vanish with my life,
How happy then were my ensuing death.

O clumsy insult! intended for highest compliment—for what was there wanting to Shakespeare's godlike supremacy unless it were that he was not a German! —he was at heart a traitor, he would abandon us now in the day of our trial because we do not esteem him as highly as our enemies do! Like a craven statesman who should sell himself to the party which promised the biggest audiences and highest salary!

"All Germany," says The Cologne Gazette, "will contemplate England's celebration of the Tercentenary with amused expectation. The music-hall and cinematograph will make such a mess of it that unquenchable laughter will run through the whole of Europe. The Quadruple Entente Shakespeare will be fêted with Maori dances, Japanese acrobats' tricks, and Italian Tarantella leaps. To complete the festival only one thing is lacking—that the dead Shakespeare should express his opinion of the living England," or let us say of the Germany of to-day and its boasted Kultur and its excess above other nations in the prevalence of crime and immorality. We do not, indeed, suppose that he would be pleased to note how the picture theatre and the music-hall of our day attract "the general," to whom after three centuries of progress his plays are "as caviare"; but we are sure that he would judge of them as a great improvement upon the cruel amusements of bull baiting and whipping chained bears and cock fighting which were popular in Elizabethan England. In "this England of the present" he would find himself at home among a people who spoke his own tongue, and were proud of him, even though his unrivalled excellence was not understood of them all, who shared his pride in the land of their birth and his, and had proved by the voluntary enlistment of millions in its defence, that their patriotism was no idle boast.

He would note that the English of our time had proved themselves no degenerate successors of the stalwarts of his day; but, merged into a larger nationality of Britons, had built upon the foundations then laid such an empire as the world had never known, a community of free nations, owning one sovereign of the line of the same kings he knew, held together by the firm bonds of loyalty to "this scepter'd isle," their ancestral home.

Wordsworth has spoken of Shakespeare as

That darling bard
Who told of Juliet and her Romeo,
And of the lark's note heard before its time,
And of the streaks that laced the severing clouds
In the unrelenting east.

"Chiefliest" he counted him of those whose verse was "more delightful than skill of mine could fashion." May we then make bold to adapt to another his invocation of Milton, and write:—

Shakespeare! thou shouldst be living at this hour:
England hath need of thee.

Need, not that thou shouldst rebuke votaries who to honour thee would prove thee traitor and timeserver—we can laugh at that misshapen birth of hate—but that thou shouldst stir in us "the thrill of war, the leaping of the blood," when the great deeds of England in past wars were told; that thou shouldst inspire us with the temper which runs through thy plays which tell the history of our kings, and "rings on them like steel on steel."

For it is this temper, writes our late-lost preacher, critic, poet, "which is mixed up with the spirit of patriotism—the love of our country as our Mother and our Home; the love of her Honour in the past, our faith in her as the refuge of our children and of liberty in the future. Our duty, indeed, our passion, it is to keep her tradition free for noble development, her indwellers free from oppression, and her coasts free from the invader. War for these duties and this love is part of a just patriotism, and all Shakespeare's outbursts of patriotic feeling are directed to this love of country, which the attempt of the Armada must have driven home to the heart of every Englishman."

Drive it home to our hearts, O Shakespeare, that we be willing to live and glad to die for England, ours and thine!

Charles Hargrove.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

To the Editor of The Inquirer.

Sir,—I shall be grateful if you will allow me to appeal in your columns for donations towards one or two bursaries for the Summer School of Social Service Unions, which is to be held this year, as usual, at the Hayes, Swanwick, at the end of June.

A resolution was passed at the last meeting which took place there, pledging the various Denominational Social Service Unions to endeavour to provide such bursaries for members of their churches to whom the expense would be a difficulty. We have been able to do this in former years, for W.E.A. students and others, with benefit both to the bursars and the School, and we trust that the generosity of your readers will permit us to do the same this year.—Yours, &c.

Catherine Gittins,

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

QUARTERLY REPORT.

The Quarterly Report which was presented to the Council of the Unitarian Association last week, contained many interesting particulars relating to Home Missionary Work, New Publications, the Colonial and Foreign Field, and Civil Rights.

Home Missionary Work.

While the war continues any new or extended work on the part of our Churches and Missionary Societies cannot easily or, perhaps, wisely be undertaken. To carry on is about as much as most of them seem able to accomplish. The reports from the congregations making applications for grants show that while a few have found it very difficult to carry on owing to a shrinkage in income, the bulk of them have not yet suffered financially to any considerable extent. What will happen "after the war" no one can tell; but that men and nations will stand in sore need of the faith and hope and love which churches exist to promote, any one can, on reflection, readily perceive.

The services at Cambridge during the University Terms have been continued, notwithstanding the absence of nearly all the men on military service. Expenses have been reduced by ministers in London very kindly taking the services; the Missionary Agent, the Rev. T. P. Spedding, preached for these ministers on the occasion of their visits.

Publications.

The valuable series of Modern Handbooks of Religion published by the Association has had, since the last meeting of the Council, the addition of 'Jesus and Christianity in the Twentieth Century,' by the Rev. Alfred Hall; and 'The Revelation of God in Nature and in Man,' by the Rev. Edgar Thackray. 'The Divine Element in Art and Literature,' by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, will be published in the course of a few weeks. 'Life Here and Hereafter,' by Dr. Mellone, it is hoped to have ready by Whitsuntide. The Rev. A. W. Fox is engaged upon the preparation of a volume dealing with the Ethics and Theology of the Old Testament. For the present, the foregoing list includes all the handbooks which the Publications Committee have in preparation; but the series will probably be added to later.

'The New Essex Hall Chant Book' is in course of preparation by the Rev. V. D. Davis. 'Counsels in War Time,' a series of papers by various writers, edited by Dr. Carpenter, will be issued at Whitsuntide. In commemoration of the tercentenary of the death of Shakespeare the Association has published an interesting tract prepared by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant on 'Shakespeare and Religion.' The well-known discourse, 'Blessed be Drudgery,' by the Rev. W. C. Gannett, has been added to the Penny Library Series of Tracts. Several of the tracts in large demand have been reprinted, including, 'What Do Unitarians Believe?' by Dr. Hargrove; 'What Must I Do to be Saved?' by the late Rev. John Page Hopps; 'A Rational View of the Bible,' by the Rev. C. J. Street; and 'The Church and War in Ancient and Modern Times,' by Dr. Mellone, reprinted from The Inquirer.

Colonial and Foreign Work.

The Unitarian Churches in Canada owe a deep debt of gratitude to the American Unitarian Association for generous financial aid and unfailing sympathy. With the exception of Montreal and Toronto, all the churches in Canada have been founded as well as assisted by the A.U.A. The severe financial crisis in Western Canada, followed by the war, crippled the churches in membership and resources, and had it not been for the support given by the Unitarians of the United States, the churches at Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver, Victoria, and Winnipeg, would probably have been compelled to close their doors. Dr. Eliot, Dr. Crothers, and other leading ministers visited the churches and successfully pleaded for increased aid, which was freely given, to tide them over a period of difficulty and discouragement. The B. & F.U.A. is at present making a grant of £50 towards the salaries of the ministers at Edmonton, Victoria, and Winnipeg. When Vancouver is in a position to appoint a minister, a grant of £50 will be made as heretofore.

In Australia the congregations and ministers at Adelaide, Melbourne, Sydney, and Brisbane, all of which churches are now self-supporting, are carrying on their work cheerfully and hopefully. In New Zealand, Auckland is self-supporting, Wellington is receiving a grant of £90, and Timaru of £50. Mr. E. McDonnell, formerly of Sydney, is in charge of the congregation at Timaru, in succession to Mr. Chapple, who is now resident in California.

In Norway the Rev. H. Haugerud reports that the Unitarian Congregation in Christiania is holding its own in spite of difficulties created by the European war; a grant of £40 is made towards his salary.

The Rev. Nilmani Chakrabarti writes that illness has prevented him of late from visiting the Unitarian Mission Stations in the Khasi Hills. The reports from the Rev. David Edwards are fairly satisfactory, but there is evidently a lack of enterprise and vigorous leadership among the native workers. The grant of £75 has been renewed, also £20 towards the College education of Mr. Edwards's son at Calcutta; and £100 Scholarship, tenable for two years, for Mr. D. N. Mitra, B.A., provided he is accepted by the Committee of Manchester College, Oxford.

In Italy, the Rev. G. Conte has continued his missionary work under difficulties caused by his own ill-health, and by the war. The grant of £40 has been renewed.

The Congregation at Johannesburg, since the resignation of the Rev. R. J. Hall, have carried on the services among themselves. The Committee hope to discover a suitable minister prepared to undertake the work there when the war is over, if not before. The Congregation have promised to raise £200 towards the salary, and the Committee of the Association will add, for a time, another £100. There is a fine field at Johannesburg for the exercise of the talents of a capable, enterprising, and tactful minister.

The grants formerly made to Brussels, Bulgaria, and Hungary, have been sus pended during the continuance of the war. No reports from any of these countries have reached the Committee of the Association since the last meeting of the Council. A message has been received from Dr. Hocart of Brussels, stating that he is well, although the Church cannot do much work at present.

The meetings of the International Congress of Religious Liberals, provisionally arranged to be held in England this year, had to be abandoned owing to the war. Dr. C. W. Wendte, the Hon. Secretary, addressed an earnest and affectionate letter to the members and friends of the Congress, pleading, when the war is over, for the renewal of friendship and co-operation among those who in all lands are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty.

Civil Rights.

The negotiations with the Baptist Union with respect to those General Baptist Chapels which have been closely identified with the Unitarian body for about a century or more, have now been completed. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Baptist Union, and the General Baptist Assembly, have come to a mutual agreement which, when carried out, will put an end to controversies which have been a source of trouble and expense for many years past. The effect of the agreement, when legal, that is Parliamentary, sanction is obtained, will be to free the Trust Deeds of a considerable number of chapels from doctrinal and ceremonial restrictions which at present impede their freedom, and might at any time give rise, as in the case of Deptford, to costly and troublesome litigation. The Committee of the Association purposes issuing a letter to the congregations concerned, about seventeen, inviting them to authorise that the necessary steps be taken for the purpose of freeing their Chapel Trusts from any restrictions which require the holding or profession of any particular theological belief or the use of any particular form of worship or ceremony, and to the intent that the said chapel and buildings used by the said Congregation may be held in trust for the worship of God, and for the religious, moral, and intellectual improvement of the Congregation for the time being worshipping there, and for its general benevolent objects.

The Model Trust Deed which had been published in the Essex Hall Year Book for upwards of twenty years, was omitted from the issue for 1916. The Civil Rights Sub-Committee have now under consideration a shorter and simpler form of Trust Deed, which they believe will better meet the needs of congregations. In drafting this model every care will be taken to state clearly that if any question should at any time arise as to the purposes for which the said church or chapel may lawfully be used, the widest meaning should be attached to the trust aforesaid, so that neither by reference to the actual or supposed opinions of the founders, nor otherwise, shall any restriction be imposed on the liberty of the congregation for the time being to change its opinions with regard to religious doctrines or modes of regulating worship.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING AT TODMORDEN.

In spite of the war cloud that hangs over everything, and the absence of cheap railway fares, there was a great rally of the friends from the affiliated schools of the Manchester District Sunday School Association at Todmorden on Good Friday. They came from Manchester and the many towns adjacent thereto, from Warrington and Liverpool, from parts of Cheshire, from the centres of East Lancashire, and others even from Halifax, Bradford, and Leeds, in all to the number of over six hundred. At the morning service the beautiful church was worthily filled. The Rev. Charles Roper, of West Kirby, conducted the service, and preached an appropriate sermon in eloquent terms against war as a crime, urging that Sunday School instruction should include the inculcation of peace principles, a knowledge of the evil results of war, and the means of its abolition.

It was no small task for the Todmorden Unitarians to cater for the material necessities of such a large assembly of guests. But they made generous provision of dinner and tea, at what must have been below cost, for more than six hundred people. The U.M.F. Church kindly lent its schoolroom for the dining-hall, and, spacious as it was, there were two sittings at both meals. The Rev. A. W. Fox, with Mr. Harry Barker, local Secretary, and their band of over 180 workers had the arrangements well organised, and everything was carried out most satisfactorily without a hitch of any kind.

The Business Meeting in the Unitarian schoolroom in the afternoon included addresses from the President, the Rev. J. Morley Mills, and Mr. H. J. Broadbent on the adoption of the Annual Report, supported by Mr. Geo. H. Leigh. Mr. Isaac Barrow (Hindley), moved, and Mr. Nathaniel Wright (Park Lane), seconded thanks to the Committee for its services, and the election of the Committee for the ensuing year. The Rev. A. W. Fox moved, and the Rev. Charles Smith (Middleton) seconded thanks to the officers, and the election of officers for 1916–17. The President moved the welcome to representatives of kindred Associations, seconded by Mr. Albert Slater (President elect), which was responded to by addresses from Miss Clephan (President, S.S.A.), the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler (N. Midland S.S.A.), the Rev. T. Graham (Midland S.S.A.), Mrs. A. E. Chaplin (Liverpool S.S. Society), and Mr. D. W. Ross, (S. Cheshire and District).

The Rev. Cyril Flower, conveyed a cordial invitation to the Association to hold its 1917 meeting at the Bank Street Chapel and School, Bolton, on condition that the war would then be ended, which was accepted with thanks. A resolution to send a message of hearty greeting and good wishes to the young men who have joined the forces from the affiliated schools, to be printed and copies sent to the schools for transmission, was unanimously agreed to.

At the Public Meeting in the evening the large Unitarian schoolroom was filled. Mr. Alderman W. Wadsworth presided, and spoke of his long connection with the Todmorden School and Church. His Worship the Mayor of Todmorden gave a hearty civic welcome in a short and breezy speech. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith, General Secretary, moved a vote of thanks to the morning preacher; the minister, congregation, and workers of the Todmorden Unitarian Church and School for hospitality; the organist and choir for their excellent music; and hosts and hostesses who entertained guests coming from a considerable distance. In seconding, the Rev. J. Morley Mills announced that the example of the Youatt Bequest had been followed by a promise of a gift of a £50 Exchequer Bond from Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy of Blackpool, the interest of which is to be used in part for the Homes and the General Fund. Addresses followed from Mrs. Morley Mills, the Rev. Richard Lee (Chesham, Bury), and the Rev. A. W. Fox.

The hymns and tunes in use during the day had been selected from the 1916 issue of 'Hymns and Choral Songs,' the words being appropriate and timely, and the tunes much enjoyed. The Todmorden Choir sang an anthem, 'The Lord is My Shepherd' (Schubert), at morning service; there was an excellent programme of organ and vocal recitals in the church during the afternoon; and at the evening meeting the choir sang three fine part songs with remarkable effect; indeed, their services during the day were most highly appreciated.

With the exception of a few slight showers the weather was fair, and enabled many of the visitors to explore the fine vale of Todmorden, encircled as it is by hills, steep and high. The church, with its beautiful and massive interior, stands in a commanding position upon a hillside in sloping park-like grounds tastefully laid out. There was everything to make the day most interesting and enjoyable to the hundreds of visitors who assembled on this memorable occasion. The meeting of many friends and co-religionists from various districts, the renewal of old acquaintances, the hearty personal greetings, as well as affection for the noble work of our Sunday Schools, combine to make the Good Friday meeting always a festival not to be forgotten, and this at Todmorden was not one whit below any of the many similar occasions in commanding interest and spiritual inspiration. To the Rev. A. W. Fox and his fellow-workers great praise was given for the completeness with which all the necessities of the occasion were supplied. Not a few remembered the previous Good Friday at Todmorden fourteen years ago, and many more will long remember the glorious time they had there on the Good Friday of 1916.

The Annual Report stated that the past year had been one of unusual difficulty and trial, due, in the main, to the continuance of the terrible conflict still raging. It is surely not much to hope (says the Report) that in the near future the work of Sunday Schools will exert a powerful influence in making the recurrence of such a struggle for ever impossible. The total number of schools affiliated to the Association is now seventy-eight. At the end of 1915 the teachers numbered 1,388 and the scholars 13,056. The schools have been seriously affected by the war, having lost no fewer than 1,575 young men. At least 965 of these have joined the Army. The Committee conclude the Report by "again commending the work of our Sunday Schools to the very earnest consideration of all who are able to render them any service. The greatest possibilities of the noblest character exist in the wise and careful development of the minds and affections of young people. The Sunday School, next to the family circle, is the most effective institution for such character building, and blessed, indeed, are they who devote time and thought to that endeavour. To contribute to the unfolding and cultivation of the noblest morals in those of the rising generation is work of priceless value in its effect on the improvement of the race, and in the making of a more glorious life for those who will be the future men and women."

The officers for 1916–17 were elected as follows:—Mr. Albert Slater is the President; Mr. J. W. Barlow, Treasurer; and the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, General Secretary.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, who will contribute an article on 'Shakespeare's Comedy' to our issue next week, is a well-known University Extension lecturer. His brilliant lectures on Aristophanes were a feature of the Summer School at Oxford last year. After leaving Oxford he took orders and was for a short time curate at St. Sepulchre's, Holborn. He then joined the Unitarian ministry, and is at present minister of George's Meeting, Exeter.

Miss Titford, who has just received the congratulations of her fellow-worshippers at Newington Green on reaching her 70th birthday, belongs to a family well known for its steadfastness in good works. Miss Titford has been a teacher in the Sunday School for fifty-eight years, and of those who welcomed her ten survive and have signed the letter of greeting. It is a truly remarkable record.

The Unitarian Church, Stalybridge, has celebrated its jubilee by the addition of a chancel and a new organ. We hope to give some account of the proceedings next week. During the fifty years there have been seven ministers, namely, the Revs. Francis Revitt, Alexander Ashworth, Joseph Freeston, William Harrison, W. G. Price, Walter Short, and the present minister the Rev. John Ellis. But the success of the congregation has depended hardly less upon the large and vigorous band of workers in the Sunday School and the allied institutions.

The foundation stone of the present building was laid in May, 1869 and on its completion it was handed over to the Trustees by Mr. Joseph Oliver, the Chairman of the Building Committee, with the following words:—"In handing over to you the building we have raised, which has been generally admired for its inward and outward beauty, we can only hope that you, the members, may build up a spiritual Church, which in its life and growth shall be as beautiful as the material building we have raised."

The Unitarian Church at Todmorden which was the scene of the crowded meetings of the Manchester and District Sunday School Association on Good Friday, is known far and wide for its stately architecture and its fine peal of bells. The present minister, the Rev. A. W. Fox was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge and Manchester New College, London. He is an excellent classical scholar and a keen student of English literature. A short time ago he was elected President of the Manchester Literary Club in succession to the late Mr. George Milner. His only brother is Sir R. E. Fox, Town Clerk of Leeds.

The American Unitarian Association is making an urgent appeal for forty thousand dollars in four weeks. "The raising of this sum of money is certainly within the means of our fellowship of churches, but it will require earnestness, enthusiasm, and persistent energy"—these are the words of Dr. Samuel A. Eliot. Without it, he tells the readers of The Christian Register, there must be a curtailment of work in several promising fields.

Among other things Dr. Eliot makes special mention of the needs of the Canadian Northwest. "Those Canadian ministers and churches are putting up a plucky fight against depressing circumstances. Are they to be sustained or deserted?" We fear that Dr. Eliot might with some justice turn to us and ask, Why are not you doing more for Canada?

We notice with deep regret the death of Dr. G. S. Barrett of Norwich, a man widely respected in his own denomination and far beyond its borders. He was Chairman of the Congregational Union in 1893; but he will be remembered chiefly for his work in connection with hymns and as the editor of 'The Congregational Hymnal.'

We are glad to notice that two Willaston boys, F. B. Hirsch and F. Skelton, have won Science Exhibitions at Downing College, Cambridge.

"The Eric Rawsthorn Scholarship," which has been founded by the generosity of Mr. J. J. Rawsthorn of Preston in memory of his son who was killed in action last June, will enable boys from Willaston School to go to Oxford or Cambridge, who would be unable to do so without its help. The amount available is £50 per annum, but the whole of it need not be awarded at any one time or to any one candidate.

We regret to announce the death of Dr. C. A. Greaves, which took place at Sturry, near Canterbury, last Sunday, at the age of 85. He was an Anglican clergyman for twenty-five years, and joined the Unitarian ministry in 1883. His degree of D.C.L. was from Durham University, where he graduated in 1868. The funeral took place on Wednesday, the service being conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

A provisional programme has been issued for the Swanwick Summer School, which will be held from June 24 to July 3. The subject of the discussions will be 'Social Reconstruction after the War,' and various aspects of this great problem, such as the influence of Christian ideals, the financial and industrial position, Trade Union regulations, women in industry, the development of the agricultural side of English life, and the drink traffic, will be dealt with by Canon Simpson, Mr. T. P. Harvey, M.P., Mr. J. A. Hobson, Sir Hugh Bell, Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Christopher Turnor, and others. Further particulars can be obtained of the Hon. Organiser, Miss Lucy Gardner, 92 St. George's Square, London, W.C. Copies of The Social Service Quarterly for April may be obtained from the Rev. H. H. Johnson, The Orchard, Croft Road, Evesham.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ballee, Co. Down.—At the monthly meeting of the Downpatrick Rural School Board, the Rev. Jos. Hy. Bibby was appointed Chairman for the ensuing term.

Brighton.—At a meeting of the congregation of Christ Church, held on the 17th inst. it was reported that the Rev. Priestley Prime had decided not to withdraw his resignation, and that the pulpit would become vacant on June 24 next. It was decided not to appoint a settled minister at present, but to ask the Provincial Assembly to arrange to supply the pulpit for the succeeding six months. The Rev. W. H. Drummond, Minister of the Provincial Assembly, was present and addressed the meeting.

Devon Ministers' Conference.—The Rev. A. E. O'Connor has held the post of Secretary of this Conference for several years, and has arranged for the ministerial exchanges and meetings, which have proved very helpful. It is with great regret that his ministerial brethren lose him from this district. To mark their sense of regard for him they have presented him with a copy of Robert Bridges's Anthology, "The Spirit of Man," inscribed as follows:—"To the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, B.D., with best wishes from his brethren of the Devon Ministers' Conference and grateful thanks for his many friendly services in their behalf."

Leeds.—Mr. F. G. Jackson writes from 8 Park Lane, Leeds: "It may interest your readers to know that a pamphlet, containing a report of the proceedings at the unveiling of the Memorial Window to the late Lord Airedale, together with a description of the window and a coloured reproduction of it, will be ready shortly. If any of your readers would care to have a copy, I shall be glad to forward same, so long as the supply lasts, on receipt of a (halfpenny) stamped, addressed envelope, measuring $8\frac{1}{4}$ in. by $5\frac{1}{4}$ in. I may add that, if there be a sufficient demand, it is proposed to publish enlargements (approximately quarto size) of the reproduction, the cost of which will be 1*s.* 6*d.* or 2*s.* each, according to the larger or smaller number ordered. If any of your readers would like these, will they please send me a postcard, stating number required?"

Leeds: Hunslet.—A two days' Japanese Bazaar, which has been held in aid of the funds for church purposes, has resulted in £190 being raised. One of the most pleasing features of this enterprise has been the generous support given by friends at Mill Hill Chapel, which has helped to bring about such an excellent result. Mr. Grosvenor Talbot opened the Bazaar on the first day, Mr. Charles Boyle presiding, and on the second day Sir William Middlebrook, M.P., performed the opening ceremony, the chairman being Mr. S. Hall, in the absence of Mr. F. J. Kitson, J.P.

Leeds: Mill Hill Chapel.—The Shakespeare Tercentenary was celebrated on Easter Sunday. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Hargrove (Minister Emeritus), who took for his morning subject "The Living and the Dead Shakespeare," and for his evening one "Shakespeare, the Man and the Creator."

Lewes.—The last of a series of fourteen weekly entertainments to the wounded soldiers in the Lewes hospitals was given in the Westgate Chapel Lecture Hall on Thursday, April 13, and took the form of a whist party. The entertainments have been mostly concerts, arranged in turn by members and friends of the congregation; and there has been a pleasant variety in the programme each evening, including dances, stories and games. The proceedings have been further diversified by excellent lectures, delivered by the Rev. H. W. Shrewsbury (Wesleyan) and by the Revs. Joseph Wood and F. K. Freeston. The evenings have been greatly appreciated by the men.

London: Kilburn.—The seventh Annual Gymnastic and Drill Display of the Unity Boys' and Girls' Clubs connected with the Kilburn Unitarian Church in Quex Road was given on Friday, the 14th inst., at Unity Hall, under the direction of Mr. Carter and Miss E. Cranbrook, M.G.T.I. Dr. Amherst D. Tyssen presided, and distributed the prizes to the successful competitors. In a few happy and appropriate remarks Dr. Tyssen strongly urged the boys and girls to continue some form of physical exercise regularly through their lives, and by so doing they would become healthy men and women. Owing to the war many of the Club workers have been unable to give their usual assistance during the past season, and great credit is therefore due to the Rev. F. Munford and Mrs. Munford, with Miss Poole and Miss Warburton, for carrying on the Clubs so successfully under very great difficulties.

London: Newington Green.—On Sunday, April 9, 1916, at a well-attended meeting held after Evening Service, an interesting presentation was made to Miss Titford. On behalf of over 125 subscribers, Mr. Turner, who presided, handed Miss Titford a letter in the following terms, together with the gold watch referred to:—"You recently attained the honoured age of 70 years, and we heartily congratulate you on the event. We hope you may long be spared to enjoy life surrounded by many friends. We are glad to take the opportunity of expressing to you our respect and admiration for the many years of strenuous and unselfish work you have devoted to others and particularly in the Newington Green Church, School, Provident Society, Mothers' Meeting, Band of Hope, Temperance Society and Women's Friendly Circle. We believe you have realised that in Christian service are found not only the first duties of life but also the highest rewards life can offer. We ask your acceptance of the accompanying Gold Watch as a token of our esteem, and wish you God speed in your work and every happiness." It is noteworthy that ten of those who were members of the Newington Green congregation when Miss Titford joined as a teacher 58 years ago, and who were then or had been teachers in the Sunday School, are among the actual signatories to the letter.

Nelson.—A successful Sale of Work, which was held on Saturday, April 8, at the Unitarian Church, brought to a close a full winter's work. Mr. Lawrence Clegg, of Burnley, performed the opening ceremony, Mr. J. T. Bibby, of Burnley, presiding. The minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, stated that the objects of the Sale of Work included a reduction of the building debt, which stood at £590. Over £92 was realised, of which £60 will go towards reducing this debt.

York.—Interest in the Celebration of the Tercentenary of Shakespeare's death has been kept up by a course of Special Sermons by the Minister, the Rev. J. Tyssul-Davis, B.A. On Easter Monday the Shakespeare Study Class made an outing to Lynton Falls, and on their return, after a Shakespearean supper, gave an Evening of Selections of Orations and Scenes, recited from various plays. Solos, duets, and a chorus were also rendered and warmly applauded.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

The Plume Trade Again.

We shall probably see, sooner or later, in the milliners' shops, evidences of the recent slaughter of albatrosses for their breast feathers in the Laysan Islands in the Pacific, one of the largest of the United States bird-reserves. According to Bird Notes and News, between 150,000 and 200,000 birds were found lying in heaps all over the island after the ravagers had departed, the white or Laysan albatross and the black-footed albatross being the chief sufferers, with the frigate bird and the blue-faced booby-bird following in order of number killed. We are glad to see that the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, at its Annual Meeting in March, unanimously adopted the following resolution :—

"That this Society, mindful of the necessity at the present crisis of restricting imports and of curtailing extravagant expenditure; having regard also to the fact that Importation of the Plumage of Wild Birds for millinery and ornamental purposes has already been condemned by both Houses of Parliament, and that the Government Bill of 1914 failed to pass into law only through the outbreak of war: urgently calls upon the Government to prohibit entirely the Importation of Wild Birds' Plumage—ostrich feathers and eider-down only excepted—as a useless and undesirable import and a wholly indefensible form of extravagance."

Notes and Queries.

Last week's Notes and Queries was a particularly interesting number. In addition to an article on 'Shakespeare's Schoolmasters,' and another on Philip James Bailey (born April 22, 1816), author of 'Festus,' whose centenary has passed almost unnoticed while we have been paying fresh tribute to the genius of Shakespeare, Cervantes, and Charlotte Brontë, it publishes a notable letter in English by Voltaire, with a reproduction in facsimile of the handwriting, which has been given to the Red Cross Society for sale by the owner, Mr. A. Forbes Sieveking. This letter was quoted by Warburton in the notes to his edition of Pope's works, where he gives the date of it as October 15, 1726, but for over a century it appears to have lain hidden, and was not published in full until Mr. Sieveking came into possession of it. Since then it has frequently been referred to, and M. Gustave Lanson, in the Revue d'Histoire littéraire de la France, has spoken of it as one of the best pieces of Voltaire's English correspondence.

In the course of the letter Voltaire describes to his friend, Thieriot, a rather disagreeable experience which he had in London when, suffering from ague, and without any money, he accepted help from Sir Everard Faulkner, a Turkey or Levant merchant, who afterwards became Ambassador at the Porte. "I have seen often my lord and lady Bolinbroke," he says, "I have found their affection still the same, even increased in proportion to my unhappiness. They offered me all, their money, their house; but I refused all, because they are lords, and I have accepted all from Mr. Faulknear, because he is a single gentleman." Later on, after expressing the hope that his friend will come to London, he says, "you will see a nation fond of her liberty, learned, witty, despising life and death, a nation of philosophers, not but that there are some fools in England. Every country has his madmen. It may be, French folly is pleasanter than English madness: but, by God, English wisdom and English honesty is above yours. One day I will acquaint you with the caracter of this strange people, but 'tis time to make an end of my English talkativeness."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

OUR work for the Belgian Hospitals in France has long had the best kind of recognition, the support of a discriminating and generous public and the gratitude and friendly co-operation of the Belgian Army Medical Service. We have now received a formal certificate of authorisation from the Local Government Board. At a time like the present when appeals are continually multiplied and small societies spring into existence to meet a temporary need or a sudden call of charity, some element of public control is necessary. In our own case we welcome it. All our business affairs are in admirable order and we have no reason to fear that the official hand will lie otherwise than lightly upon us.

WE have heard of some readers, who, while they possibly admire our persistence, confess that they are a little tired of our appeals and begin to wonder why we dwell so constantly upon the wrongs of Belgium. Well, there are two reasons. First we have found our own particular field of work in the vast area of war service ; we have established close personal relationships and undertaken far-reaching responsibilities ; and this work must be continued with all possible vigour and efficiency till the end of the war. Anything else would be unworthy of us. It is better to do one thing with quiet and unflagging faithfulness than to begin many things with eager enthusiasm and then let them drop unfinished from our hands.

BUT there is a second reason, which is always present with us. It is this. The word Belgium marks for us the entrance into all the moral problems of the war. We have supported the war not only with clear political conviction but also with spiritual passion. There has been no public decision in our time which has been so clearly and invincibly right and so far removed from the possibility of moral dispute as our answer to the call to defend the liberties of Belgium. About many other things we may be doubtful, but not about this. The Belgian claim is thus central for the conscience, and no citizen of this country can turn away from it without taking sides with public wrong. We are engaged in a moral conflict in which there is no quiet neutral zone in which good men can claim to be left alone with their own opinions. Of all this Belgium is to us the sacred symbol, and we can never mention her heroism or press her claims without feeding the fire of moral passion in our own hearts.

THE surrender of the British force at Kut will be felt by all of us as a nasty blow. It offends our pride that the Turks should have outwitted us even in a remote corner of the field. Gallipoli was to a large extent retrieved in the public mind by the splendid withdrawal ; and Kut would have remained as a shining example of endurance, if only it had been relieved. But we must bear our disappointment with dignity and avoid the instinct which looks for a scapegoat, whether in the army or the Cabinet, in order to satisfy our anger. If there has been incompetence it must be carefully searched out, and no mercy must be shown to leaders who cannot lead ; but all this is a matter for calm judgment, and we show that we are still masters of ourselves and of the situation by keeping cool and avoiding all intemperate language. Let us also remember that we are not simply making the best of a bad job or feeding ourselves with unreal comfort, when we dwell on the military importance of what has been accomplished in spite of the surrender. The objects we had in view were sufficiently important to justify grave risks, and to a large extent these objects have been accomplished.

ONE of the bright spots about Kut has been the chivalry of the Turkish commander. He has allowed General Townshend to keep his sword, and arrangements are being made for the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners. To the Relief Force which has fought so gallantly against terrible difficulties the King has sent a gracious message. Weather, it reminds us, is one of the enemies against which the most skilful general may often have to fight in vain. The message is in the following terms :—

> Although your brave troops have not had the satisfaction of relieving their beleaguered comrades in Kut, they have, under the able leadership of yourself and subordinate commanders, fought with great gallantry and determination under most trying conditions. The achievement of relief was denied you by floods and bad weather, and not by the enemy, whom you have resolutely pressed back. I have watched your efforts with admiration, and am satisfied that you have done all that was humanly possible, and will continue to do so in future encounters with the enemy.

THE Irish Rebellion has collapsed. Criminal in its aims it was almost more criminal in its weakness. Some of the leaders have already paid the extreme penalty, and rightly so. The blood of many innocent men was upon their heads. The question of dealing with the ill-assorted rabble of their followers is one full of difficulties. Some of them apparently belong to the extreme syndicalist group of labour men, others to the dreamy idealists, feeble both in brain and in imagination, who believed quite genuinely that an Irish Republic, promulgating its laws in Gaelic, was the sure and certain way to Utopia. For the latter it is possible to feel chiefly pity. In England they would probably have been conscientious objectors and found an outlet for their energies in fighting with the Tribunals. The Government must deal with them firmly, but we hope that it will extend to them as much clemency as the public safety allows.

The Labour element in the revolt calls attention once again to the seething elements of discontent, which have long been a menace to social order in Dublin. Their connection with the extreme forms of Irish nationalism is only indirect. Their demand is for better wages, better housing and a more decent life, and it is a demand which will have to be met with more tolerance and sympathy than it has always received in the past. Bad housing is a crying evil in Dublin. Its fine public buildings conceal streets of decaying tenements, which are quite unfit to be human homes. If the great fires, which have accompanied the revolt, have spread into some of these quarters, few people will regret that at last an extensive scheme of rebuilding must be undertaken.

Mr. Birrell announced his resignation of the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland in the House of Commons on Wednesday. No other course was open to him. He did not pose as the victim of popular clamour. He confessed with complete candour that he had misjudged the situation; but it was a mistake which had a noble side, and few people will read unmoved the simple words in which he describes the way in which he devoted himself to the supreme task of keeping Ireland united during the war. "I knew," he said, "that the difficulties were great. I knew the ice was thin, yet I did conceive it to be my duty to run even great risks in order to maintain in the eyes of Ireland herself and in the face of Europe a picture of unbroken unanimity within the boundaries of her soil." The real difficulty of the situation, and it is one which must be probed to the bottom and faced in all its bearings, arose from the fact that the Sinn Fein movement was able to control an armed force, and the possession of arms except by the forces of the Crown must always mean potential rebellion.

The Government has decided, after a careful review of all the facts of the situation, to bring in a measure of general Compulsion. It is a decision which will be welcomed by some people on the ground that the word Compulsion stands to them for something positively beautiful and good. They have long wanted it, and at last they are to have their hearts' desire. But by most of us, who thrill with pride at the thought of our voluntary army, it will be simply accepted as necessary and inevitable. We know that the men who are promoting it in the House of Commons are not swayed by military passion. They are of the sober civilian type, and many of them have been convinced against their will. In these circumstances we are content to follow, for the country long ago pledged itself to do everything needful to bring the war to a triumphant end. We fear that it must be confessed that the voluntary system can only be worked with complete success when we want a selection of men. It breaks down when the whole manhood of the nation must be mobilised for national safety, for there is no means of insuring that every man will put the public good above his private gain and come forward of his own free will to take his full share of hard and dangerous duty.

But in the circumstances Compulsion is a rather question-begging term. It suggests forcing a man to do something to which he may reasonably object. What the Government has resolved to do is not so much to take forcible measures against reluctance as to call upon every man to fulfil one of the elementary duties of citizenship. This is the particular way in which the individual life must sacrifice itself for the good of the whole. From one point of view it is an act of self-defence, for without organised resistance all our homes would be placed in instant danger of outrage and destruction. From another, it is an offering of gratitude for the help and protection, the mental invigoration and the rich treasures of human fellowship which come to us from the community of which we form a part. To enjoy these things and then to refuse to defend them, still more to continue to enjoy them in safety while others are dying in order that our country may live, is not to display qualities which become the free citizens of a free state.

We called attention some time ago to the sad loss which has befallen the cause of international friendship in the death of Dr. Sieper of Munich. It is one of the minor tragedies of the war, reducing as it does the small group of men whose influence might have been exerted on the side of goodwill in coming years, though it is only deep and far-reaching political changes in Germany herself which can make friendship possible except in narrow circles with clearly defined interests in common. It was the failure to give due weight to the political factor which sterilised much of the effort of Dr. Sieper and his friends and led the efforts to organise Anglo-German friendship to exhaust themselves in a gush of sentimental oratory.

Our perception of this fact, and we were keenly aware of it before the outbreak of the war, does not, however, diminish the pleasure with which we have read a glowing tribute to Dr. Sieper's memory by Prof. Foerster. We quote from a translation of his article, which appeared recently in The Cambridge Review:—

> The main significance of his [Dr. Sieper's] work, extending over many years, was the promoting of better understanding between Germany and England. This cause, to which he devoted himself with self-sacrificing ardour until the outbreak of the war, grew out of his long, practical, educational work in England, his numerous connections with her leading men, and his profound insight into the specific British character. Prof. Sieper was convinced that in many respects English and German character, English individualism and German power of organisation, ought to supplement each other — in spite of our great divergence of interests as regards the dividing up of the world.....In influential English circles he was honoured and loved as a true German of universal education; to many influential people he taught appreciation of the real German character, and many were the stupid misunderstandings which he cleared up. Some circles took it amiss that he never ceased, even during the war, to protest against the passionate one-sided judgment of the English people, and that he dared to express openly his truer knowledge of the real state of things. He was too really a German to consider it unpatriotic to express that which he had recognised as the truth.

THE NEMESIS OF DOCILITY.

It is impossible not to honour the instinct which desires to think as well as possible about men who are arrayed in arms against us. It is also natural to all generous and high-minded persons to look forward eagerly to the healing of the wounds of enmity and division, and to be impatient of any suggestion that few of us are likely to live to see the end of an estrangement so deep and decisive as that which exists between ourselves and Germany. But many of us have been brought slowly and reluctantly to face the duty of testing the truth of our own dreams and desires by the facts of the situation. Our hearts would leap with joy if we could really believe that it is only a few militarists in Berlin, the gang of Prussian junkers and overlords, who are heartily in favour of this war and defend the fearful crimes which have been committed in the German name. It would then seem reasonable to hope that when they are discredited and overthrown we shall be left with the comparatively simple task of making friends with millions of people, who are for the most part just like ourselves, with the same instincts of duty, the same love of freedom and justice, the same hatred of oppression and the same respect for the rights of other men. It is easy to support this type of optimism with warm emotional appeals and to accept it because it agrees with a sentimental view of the goodness of human nature, which it is taken for granted that all virtuous people, who have kept their hearts free from hatred and military passion, ought to possess. But we have still to face the question, is it true? Does a close examination of the recent activities of the German spirit, especially in the spheres of politics and education, encourage this belief in latent spiritual sympathies and a close identity in moral ideals with ourselves?

May we recommend those of our readers who wish not to dismiss these questions but to examine them to read with care Mr. Edmund Holmes' study of German character called 'The Nemesis of Docility.' The title indicates his conclusion, but the book itself is a masterly piece of psychological analysis, and the name of the author is a guarantee that it is written with restraint and good feeling. His object is to study the effect of despotism as it filters down through every grade of the nation's life. In becoming an efficient machine, with the aggrandisement and glory of the State as its supreme object, Germany has destroyed the power of initiative and loyalty to ideals of freedom and justice among her citizens. In the last resort the conscience, the energy, the will of every man must be made subservient to the purposes of the military machine. His chief end is to be docile and to impose docility upon others. This is the source of the arrogance, the aggressive egoism, which has gradually leavened the whole nation and destroyed all sensitiveness to the rights of other people.

> The dogmatism [Mr. Holmes writes] that feeds on docility and is then imitated by the docile has two main aspects. Excessive self-assertion, a readiness to impose oneself (sich imponieren) on others, is one aspect. Coupled with this is the tendency to bully and browbeat all who are willing to submit, or who must perforce submit to such treatment. Excessive self-conceit, an inordinately high opinion of oneself and one's own belongings, is the other aspect. Coupled with this is the tendency to despise and belittle all other persons and all things which are not one's own. These two aspects have much in common and readily merge into one. When the dogmatic spirit pervades a whole nation one thing is sure to happen. A strongly militant type of patriotism will be generated, a sentiment compounded of three elements—of a national esteem which knows no limits, of a contempt for other nations which also knows no limits, and of a readiness to translate that contempt into aggressive action.

With great acuteness Mr. Holmes traces the effects of this pressure of State-dogmatism in the deadening of intelligence and the drying up of Germany's spiritual fertility. Under such conditions there can be no healthy growth; all the power of self-criticism and inner renewal is lost; and the moral standards which exist not to further our own ends but to rebuke and inspire us, are discredited and annulled. But the nemesis of docility reveals itself also in more active and terrifying ways. It is not merely that the mind becomes incapable of dealing with unfamiliar problems and strange situations, and all things which are not strictly forbidden cease to be wrong; there is, as Mr. Holmes points out, grave danger of reaction from over-rigid discipline into anarchic forms of violence and self-indulgence. And this is what actually takes place. "The orgies of immorality in which Berlin indulges, the outbursts of depraved criminality which from time to time furnish the readers of the German newspapers with a morbid excitement, the more wanton and purposeless of the atrocities which have disgraced the German army in the present war, are doubtless," so he writes, "the results of such a reaction." The German population is thus deadened and brutalised by its docility, and its submissiveness hovers continually on the borderland of immoral self-assertion. Whether we regard its indifference to the higher claims of humanity, its callousness in face of cruelty to native races, or its dismal record of domestic crime, we are face to face with the immeasurable disasters of a system which has turned efficient and triumphant enmity against the rest of the world into its ideal of national beatitude.

The problem of friendship after the war is one which can only be discussed profitably when we keep all these disconcerting facts steadily in view. It is not going to be a case of cakes and ale and handshakings all round the moment peace is declared. If the leaders of the extreme military party are beaten and lose credit in Germany much will have been gained, but we shall still be a long way off the mutual understandings based upon a common reverence for justice and freedom, without which friendship must always be insecure. It has taken more than a generation to train modern Germany for aggression. It will probably take her quite as long to unlearn the lesson in the school of misfortune. And we on our side can do very little to shorten the long delay, for it is her own proud and inhuman spirit which must be broken and then remade by her own effort and desire in a gentler and more tolerant school. We can do Germany herself no greater disservice than to let her think that our friendship is simply to be had for the asking, or that friendship with her can be of value to any nation until she liberates herself from the false ideals which have betrayed and enslaved her. We know that these slow conclusions of peace will be distasteful to some of our sentimentalists, who have an instinctive dislike for the rough edges of moral problems and seem to prefer an earthly paradise to-morrow to the kingdom of Heaven in a thousand years. But men of religion will face them undismayed. It is not for them to make bargains with the Almighty about the times and the seasons when justice and charity shall have their perfect work. Their part is to labour as much as one generation may at the work of the ages, remembering that even a hundred years are but as a day compared with the life of a nation or the slow unfolding of the purposes of God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

FREEDOM.

Whose freedom is by sufferance, and at will
Of a superior, he is never free.
Who lives, and is not weary of a life
Exposed to manacles, deserves them well.
The state that strives for liberty, though foiled,
And forced to abandon what she bravely sought,
Deserves at least applause for her attempt,
And pity for her loss. But that's a cause
Not often unsuccessful; power usurped
Is weakness when opposed; conscious of wrong,
'Tis pusillanimous and prone to flight;
But slaves that once conceive the glowing thought
Of freedom, in that hope itself possess
All that the contest calls for; spirit, strength,
The scorn of danger, and united hearts;
The surest presage of the good they seek.

Cowper.

The great bases of English character, for instance, its moderation and veracity, its firm hold of reality, its reverence for Law and right, its historical tenacity and aversion to speculative politics;—these which appear materialistic and unattractive when contemplated from without, are the grounds of legitimate and wholesome self-respect at home. We know them better than we can any different good less intimate with our own life; and even our blind attachment to them may be wiser than any precarious judgment of understanding quickened by no love. At all events, this attachment is the Providential guardian for the world of the moral deposit which has been entrusted to us, and which we are not to compromise through indifference or to surrender to anything but indubitable Right. And if patriotism is often quite unconscious of its own grounds; if it does not reason on the virtues and liberties of the national heritage, or organise schemes for the future of the world; if its imagination kindles chiefly at the mere mention of the home name, or the sound of the native song; if the mere shape of the island on the map, and the free line of its shores, should look up at our foolish eye with unspeakable appeal; if the very hedgerows and dotted trees, the sedgy streams and modest hills, though no better than those of other lands, should rise into the memory as pictures of untold beauty; this is but like the recall of the sacred features of the absent or the dead, not unique in loveliness themselves, but symbols to us of a treasure consecrated and infinite.

James Martineau.

O GOD, the Might of all them that put their trust in Thee, grant that we may be more than conquerors over all that make war upon our souls, and in the end may enter into perfect peace in Thy Presence. Amen.

THE COMEDY OF SHAKESPEARE.

Only a little more than three hundred years ago, before a full theatre, the Master said farewell:—

Our revels now are ended. These our actors,
As I foretold you, were all spirits and
Are melted into air, into thin air.
....We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.

"What an audience was that of Shakespeare! What youthful and pleasing souls! They scarcely troubled themselves about probabilities. They did not care to be always laughing. They came less to be amused than to muse. In these young minds were dark passions and brilliant dreams waiting for the poet to come and lay bare to them the novelty and the splendour of heaven. They were not astonished at the sight of fairyland." And ever since, in spite of our fall from poetry to prose, some such audiences have come together feeling that a comedy of Shakespeare is a vision. "Do not press its fictions too hard; do not probe their contents. Let them float before your eyes like a charming swift dream." We are in a world where poet's licence is the supreme law, and only poetic standards hold. Prose may dominate by the page, but the background is Arcady, and in front of this background the most realistic figures, the most extravagant creations, the most delicate "daughters of dreams and of stories" are all at home. Imagination, romance, poetry, are the ample scenery, amid which some quest of love, some gentle charity, some loyal service, some strife of passion, some excellent conceited foolery, is to be enacted. No egoist's puppets will play here.

O brave, new world
That has such people in't!

All will move with easy affability, generous affection, fair courtesy, fine behaviour, merry laughter, nimble wit, cunning humour, or subtle deceit. And though there are many exceptions, the general cast of countenance inclines to the pensive and wistful. His first comedy, 'Love's Labour's Lost,' was written when he was hardly more than a boy. A laughing fancy of love and wit, it is full of the prettiest piffle in the world. Certain lords determine to shut out love from life, and devote themselves to study and amusement. But love breaks in and laughs them to scorn. In this fragile bit of precious art are found all the possibilities of Shakespeare. Prospero's magic and the alchemy of poetry. The noble sympathy with every kind of character. The sense of the inevitableness of real life as a power from which we cannot escape. This sense of life is the most wonderful thing in Shakespeare. He can dissolve it into the airiest poetry, the most fleeting music, but he is always conscious of its power. Around us are forces of caprice and change, of death and destruction, and derisive laughter, ever threatening to break in. In many forms his wand will call them forth:—

As nimble jugglers that deceive the eye,
Dark-working sorcerers that change the mind,
Soul-killing witches that deform the body,
Disguised cheaters, prating mountebanks,
And many such-like liberties of sin.

Man for ever and ever shatters himself against these. This is Comedy and Tragedy. They are not the same in Shakespeare, but they are always a unity. These forces are comely and kindly enough now in the hey-day of youthful make-believe, only now and then donning a sinister mask. But one day they will take dreadful shapes as in 'Hamlet,' breaking as fearful realities into his fool's paradise of words, words, words.

This mere boy from the country seems to have soon made his powers felt in the theatre. We find him re-writing the crude stuff of his senior in the craft. At the playhouse was an old comedy on the taming of a shrew. A time-honoured theme. Shakespeare went to work on it. The characters burst into real life in his hands. A father, a dear pink-and-white daughter, and a tribe of suitors are all at their wits' end. Kate, the other daughter, will use her tongue and her hands as she chooses, and not as they dictate. How can they solve the problem of getting her off their hands? Then comes the rollicking Petruchio, a-wooing in the spirit of a Drake or Raleigh—a spirit of immense adventure. He will face an Armada of hostile Kates. He woos in his own fashion—and she likes it. And the end is wholesome. As Petruchio was the only bit of real life among the suitors, so Kate was worth a dozen fluffy Biancas. The play has a quaint, quixotic turn; but lyric love is a pretty forthright thing here. This is not the Master's finest mood. Again, he summons his patrons to the revels. And now his stage is the circle of the fairy world. A hint from Plutarch, a line from Ovid, a page from an old romance, a few memories of the Stratford woods under the moon, when he caught the laughter of Robin Goodfellow at midnight mischief. Out of such scraps he wove that dazzling fantasy, 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.' A silver tissue of bold inventions, a mockery made of air and flame and elfin laughter. All is executed in the same exquisite mood. Darkness and the fitful moon, the smell of thyme and flowers, the hum of wings, the quivering spider-threads, the "loving languor which is not repose," the dreamy verse, the chanted lullaby, the nodding "pastoral cowslips," the nocturne of Philomel. Within this spell the lovers move uncertain, undefined, following or fleeing one another in a mazy dance. And into the magic circle march boisterous Bottom and his comrades to rehearse a play of love.

Bless thee, Bottom! thou art translated.

How describe the delicious farce that follows?—It is fairy foolery—

Ho, daffodilly, lend your cap,
And hyacinth your bells.

Man who aspires to play the hero's part—but the elves are peeping from the acorn cups, and the woods and waters are twinkling with wit and tittering with ironic laughter—"What fools these mortals be!"

If we compare Shakespeare with any other of the great masters of comedy—Aristophanes, Cervantes, Molière, the contrast is startling. They all start with some idea, and their characters are made absurd by being brought into the light of that idea. But Shakespeare seems not to start from any particular idea, and does not appear to work to any definitely preconceived end. It all looks as magnificently casual as nature. I have often wondered that no ingenious critic has yet written a book to show that he was, indeed, the most subjective writer who has ever lived. For as he grows and his sense of life becomes fuller, so his comedy and tragedy just deepen in intensity. I confess I find no other law of development. And I marvel that he was able to express all that was going on in himself through the characters on his stage, borrowing the plots into which he fitted them from other people.

From the pastoral 'Midsummer Night's Dream' we can turn to that other pastoral, 'As You Like It.' This is a charming caprice. But there is all the difference between it and the 'Midsummer Night' fantasy. Here are no fairies. And moonlight has become daylight. Summer it is in the forest, but there is a nip in the air, a touch of autumnal sadness, a sough in the wind, that foretells "winter and rough weather." Love is the theme, but the modulations in key are more varied. The tone is lyrical, but the form is prose. There is mirth, and there is melancholy, and there is self-conscious criticism of both. Surely our poet has suffered somewhat. These philosophers prate of "the simple life." These lovers are fleeing from the corruption of courts. Every character is a mood, the whole is a concerto of whimsical egoists. To and fro we watch them pass and repass under the stately trees—the banished Duke, the melancholy Jacques, the motley Fool, the constant Celia, the thrilling Rosalind, Old Adam and the young Orlando. What undertone do we catch? The old faith that man is only truthful and modest in the country? The pretty belief that woods keep his soul serene, and brooks his conscience cleanly?—Perhaps. Shakespeare got the story from a novel, but he added three figures, and they are significant, for they are all critical of the pastoral convention—Jacques, the dear crack-brained Touchstone, and Audrey. And Rosalind, too, we will give to Shakespeare:—

With orient pearl, with ruby red,
With marble white, with sapphire blue,
Her body every way is fed.

So sang Lodge. But with Shakespeare it is not only her body. Her mind is such a mine of precious jewels, flashing on us their every hue, trembling, sparkling, dazzling. A bewildering, glittering cascade of light and laughter and love. She is all a woman, and will have her own way—even with Shakespeare. She uses her disguise not to hide but to reveal. She cannot counterfeit. Unlike Viola, she ever told her love. Told it in a hundred ways. Happy Orlando, with such an instructor! Cupid himself might have been her scholar and learned to perfect his art. Let him look to his office:—

Why was Cupid a boy?—
And why a boy was he?—
He should have been a girl,
For aught that I can see.

'As You Like It' is one of a group of comedies that make a golden constellation. Set in a blue glory of romance they twinkle with humour. 'The Merchant of Venice' combines two impossible stories. Yet out of each emerges a figure, Shylock from the one, Portia from the other, most real of all the characters in the comedies. Portia moves through marble halls, the heiress, with title-deeds and ancestors. She has a touch of the spoilt child. She gives herself to her lover with all the circumstance of the great lady. Shylock is the dark Rembrandt over against this glowing Leonardo. Pride of blood, and history are behind him too, but siniste: in his case. Wealth has opened her mind. It has closed his. It has brought her "troops of friends." It has hardened his heart, and darkened his house. At length the two stand face to face and the dignity of the one and the malignant tenacity of the other rise to tragic grandeur.

In 'Much Ado About Nothing' we are in the golden gardens of the Renaissance. Jest and paradox and merry words flaunt and flash and sparkle like a feather in a cap, or a dagger from its sheath, or a jewel on an arm. Here they are in love with life. Their speech and their laughter and their silk and satin braveries are as the foam of their brimming enjoyment. Of all Benedick is the most fantastic. Beatrice is the most wilful. So came about the sport when on a summer's day Cupid set traps in the garden, and they were caught. Then tragedy threatens the loves of all. All is well, however. And "the catastrophe is a nuptial." "Strike up pipers!"

And now that our hearts are melted with the moonlight and music of Portia's garden, and our heads are giddy with dancing at the wedding of Benedick and Beatrice, we come to the carnival of 'Twelfth Night.' Here are lurking the deepest ironies of Shakespeare's comedy. Humour is the atmosphere of the whole play. It permeates even the poetry and the music. And what of Viola?—

Said Cupid smiling,—"Must I really choose?
All are so beautiful, so lovely—yet,
Before the lily, e'en before the rose,
Truly I do prefer the violet."

And we love Viola the best. She will brag and swagger and talk big, lest it be discovered that she is a woman. She has that "excellent thing in woman," a voice, "soft, gentle and low." She never told her love. But she told the Duke's only too well. The languorous Duke, the veiled Lady, and Viola with her grave eyes between them. What paradox is here? Where now are those others who "delight in masques and revels sometimes altogether"? Enter then the other votaries of Cupid in this his carnival of misrule. Sir Toby has his suitor to present, and Maria has "fools in hand." Sir Andrew's love affairs are left to our imagination, like the rare adventure of Pigrogromitus and the Vapians, but Malvolio must not be taken lightly. Shall we envy him his hour of bliss, his strutting fantasy in yellow stockings? Alas! that what should have been Jove's doing on high Olympus was but hatched at the buttery-bar. "Heigh ho, the wind and the rain!"—Yes, we have been hearing the storm gathering even behind these festive scenes. The stealthy step of tragedy came near the door. Her face looked in at the window. Even as far back as 'The Two Gentlemen' we saw the tragic mask for a moment:—

There grew a wrinkle on fair Venus' brow.

Now she is on the threshold, and will be admitted. Shall we not ring down the curtain before the floods rise, and the storm hushes all laughter but that of the fool and the madman, huddled together where "light thickens" and "horrors accumulate"? But our brave Shakespeare weathered this storm of tragedy. Never did his humour desert him, even though it turned to grinning ghastliness by Yorick's grave and in Timon's dismal den:—

The stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill.

And he came back from those perilous seas, home to the sunny islands of romance full of "sounds and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not":—

Come on, Sir. Now you set your foot on shore
In Novo Orbe.

Here is the cell of the great Alchemist whose art will extract from Comedy and Tragedy the Elixir of Life. He can "dulcify and sublime," and show us visions of love and beauty, reconciling us to the world of men and women. And his last word to us—

The rarer action is
In virtue than in vengeance.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

The Royal Academy Exhibition seems to be this year, more than ever, the expression of English traditions which are really dying a violent death, but to which we cling with the tenacity of those for whom custom and habit constitute the beginning and end of existence. It is true that in the lives of most people, though the whole of Europe is convulsed with war, things still go on much as usual, and Nature herself sets us the example of quiet attention to duty as the familiar processes of spring are carried on, punctually and imperturbably, in the midst of a world-devastation. This is, on the whole, a good thing: the conscientious performance of every-day tasks, which cannot, in any case, be shirked, keeps the mind healthy and renders life stable. But it is surely remarkable that the men to whom we turn for some fresh vision, some piercing insight into the mystery of the great evolutionary changes which most of us but dimly apprehend, should be as little stirred out of their ordinary routine as the average hard-working man or woman, and that they, too, should find adequate means of self-expression in the commonplaces of normal experience.

We should not, however, like to seem ungrateful for the efforts which have been made—in some instances with happy effect—to charm us from our sorrows and keep the pleasant side of life before us. The shimmer of sunlit water and the heavenly colour of bluebells can never lose their power to quicken the sense of beauty, and we must not suffer the loveliness of spring in David Murray's 'Happy England' to be obliterated even by the shadow of death which hangs about the huge hull of the warship impressively portrayed in Bernard Gribble's picture, 'Silent Might,' which hangs above it, reminding us of the price an Empire pays for her proud place in the sun. It is quite possible to feel, like the girl in one of R. H. Benson's novels, who has been forced to study certain sinister psychic problems against her will, that just to fall back on the familiar and the normal is to find the supreme consolation in the midst of hitherto unknown experiences that threaten to sweep us off our feet, and to show real wisdom at the same time. And yet, when the destinies of nations are in the melting pot, and red ruin is spreading far and wide through some of the fairest lands on earth, it is clear that we can only forget what is happening, and put aside all speculations about the future, at the risk of numbing our consciousness and drugging our intellect, and it is not the province of genius to help on that deadening process.

Many of our artists have felt the challenge of these troubled times, but in some curious way its tremendous significance seems to have escaped them. Perhaps Clausen's 'Youth Mourning,' a piece of pure, cold symbolism in which almost everything is left to the imagination—for which we are indeed thankful—comes nearer than anything else in the whole exhibition to a real expression of the emotions felt by all of us at the present time. That slender, bowed figure, those scrawled white crosses, that bare, grey landscape remain in the memory, and speak to the heart in language which Frank Dicksee's 'The Avenger,' John Charlton's 'The Awakening,' and even Frank Brangwyn's massively conceived 'Mater Dolorosa Belgica,' to say nothing of the numerous attempts to paint actual warfare, either at sea or on land, utterly fail to convey. Frankly, the war-pictures, for the most part, in spite of much cleverness of execution, are little more than pictorial melodrama, or translations in colour of sensational paragraphs from the newspapers which somehow do not convey as much horror as the printed word. No one has attempted to interpret the mysteries of life and death, or to foreshadow some sort of regenerated world in which war shall be no more, or to interpret imaginatively the life of the toiler and the passion of self-sacrifice which has seized whole nations, and will be the one sure foundation upon which all our moral theories must be built up in future.

Some of the portraits are surprisingly good this year, though one misses Sargent's fine studies as much as ever. Orpen and Shannon take the lead, and the 'Lady with the Amethyst' by the latter has, we believe, been purchased for the Chantry Bequest. Mr. John Lavery's 'Miss Elizabeth Asquith' is very charming, with its dull golden colouring, and his 'Hazel in Black and Gold' is a brilliant piece of work. Laura Knight's vivid pictures, steeped in sunshine and full of an amazing vitality, are, of course, a joy to remember, but we wonder whether she does not see her landscapes too intensely and in too hard a light to get the full beauty out of them. Her 'Spring,' a stretch of undulating country illuminated with a rainbow, is extraordinarily clever, but it seems to suffer from some confusion of detail which creates restlessness rather than repose, and the two figures in the foreground appear oddly self-conscious, though they are far less important than the lambs in the adjoining field. This tendency to confusion and extreme vivacity seems to us to spoil several pictures this year, notably those by Gerald Moira, though his 'War Workers,' Sisters of Mercy working at a sunny window, is full of genuine joie de vivre. The limits of space permit only a brief mention of other pictures in the exhibition, such as 'The Return to the Front,' in which Mr. Richard Jack strives to be purely realistic and succeeds, perhaps, in being too photographic; Sargent's decorative designs, 'Archers' and 'Bacchanal,' probably meant for a ceiling, and Sir E. A. Waterlow's impressive 'In his hand are the deep places of the earth.'

THE WORLD'S BEAUTY.

What use do we make of the beauty of the world? Do we value it only as a means of enjoyment, as a divinely appointed source of pleasurable exaltation; or are we inspired by it in our turn, according to our gifts and powers, to be creators of beauty? I think that all loveliness should light a torch in us. The emotion of beauty must issue in noble activities. Our thank-offering must be the gift to the world of some answering loveliness of life. The great creative splendours of Nature and of Man purify and ennoble those who look upon them with "the heart that watches and receives." But unless we realise this divine glory in some way in our being and doing, we are wasting beauty; we are degrading godlike impulses to the rank of our sensual pleasures.

N. Anderton; at Monton.

RETRIBUTION BOTH WAYS.

Do not suppose, my friends, as some of the ancients appear to have done, that Nemesis only followed up the evil-doer and exacted the full score against him. The divine law of Retribution is just as certain on the track of the well-doer, and will just as surely give him the harvest of his honest and true dealings. Be of good courage; the rogues of the earth cannot succeed against the Righteous Judge of all worlds.

W. G. Tarrant; at East Hill, Wandsworth.

VICARIOUS SUFFERING.

Unjust and unfair it seems that the innocent should suffer because sinful men do wrong, that the good should bear burdens laid upon them by the folly of the wicked; but it is the fundamental condition of a universal civilisation. If the Cross of Calvary means anything, it means this, that while it is possible for one man to scale great heights of excellence and virtue, he cannot isolate himself in the exclusive enjoyment of his attainment. There can never be a heaven of absolute peace and safety so long as there is one soul outside that suffers oppression and violence.

Lawrence Redfern; at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTING.

Conscience is a divine guide only when it has been fortified by sound judgment, and purified from every taint of selfishness. Respect for conscience is one of the marks of a civilised people. Unfortunately, the delusion that any sort of spontaneous conscience is a divine oracle has made conscientious objecting a by-word. You must be very pure-hearted and wise before your conscientious objection can carry any moral weight. And if your conscience points you, not towards, but away from, the path of danger, by prayer and fasting verify that it is indeed your conscience, and not your cowardice, that speaks.

J. H. Weatherall; at Essex Church, Kensington.

THE HOLY ROOD.

The rod put forth buds and bloomed blossoms and bare ripe almonds. This is what the rod of the man of God's choice does. Philologically, the word rod is derived from a word meaning to grow. The living rod is impressive. At its advent all murmurs cease. It is the symbol of a living and loving rule. The rod separated from its life-giving and love-giving source is the mere weapon of punishment and of rule by fear, the symbol of power in its forms of violence. The dead rod can only weld things together mechanically, involuntarily and murmuringly. The living rod unites things by natural affinities and affections. The one is the symbol of creative power; the other becomes a bauble, the symbol of outworn and dead methods of exercising power; it may be set with gems and carved with flowers and fruit, but it merely apes the living rod and fails, whereas the other never faileth. For it is the holy rood.

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Annual Meeting of the Society was held in the historic "Hen-dy-Cwrdd," Aberdare, on Monday, May 1, when representatives were present from most of the churches within the Society's area, besides a large number of other members from various parts of the country. The Rev. Rudolf Davis, the Secretary and District Minister of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, was also present as a representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, while the Association's President, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., was also present during part of the proceedings, and addressed a largely attended public meeting in the chapel in the evening. The annual business meeting was presided over by the Rev. Simon Jones, President of the Society, who had just returned from France, where he had been doing voluntary Red Cross work in one of the hospitals. Unfortunately, Mr. Jones was laid aside with scarlet fever while he was abroad, but happily he is now nearly well. He received a most cordial welcome from his many friends. The Committee's Report contained a record of much useful and excellent work done during the year, notwithstanding the very difficult conditions which had inevitably existed owing to the war. The financial report was also fairly satisfactory. Amongst other interesting items the Committee reported that the Rev. W. J. Phillips, Hon. Secretary of the Society, had also been appointed District Minister to the Churches since the end of 1915, an appointment made possible by a generous grant-in-aid from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The Rev. Rudolf Davis spoke of the work done by the Western Union, and gave a most interesting outline of some of the duties undertaken by a District Minister. Mr. D R. Llewellyn, of Aberdare, was elected President of the Society for the ensuing year, and other officers and committees were for the most part re-elected.

In the afternoon a meeting was held, welcoming the Rev. E. R. Dennis as pastor of "Hen-dy-Cwrdd." An impressive devotional service was conducted by the Rev. D. G. Rees, after which the chair was taken by the Rev. R. J. Jones, for many years minister of the Chapel. There were several speakers, including representatives of various societies, amongst them being the Rev. Rudolf Davis, the Rev. T. Arthur Thomas, and the Rev. E. T. Evans. Several orthodox ministers also took part in the greetings extended to Mr. Dennis, and expressed their readiness to co-operate with him in any good work that would tend to ennoble and uplift the district in which their common work was being done. Mr. Gwilym Griffiths, the Hon. Secretary, gave Mr. Dennis a cordial welcome on behalf of the church, and emphasised the absolute unanimity of the church in asking him to be their minister; Mr. John Evans, speaking on behalf of the Sunday School, said they had already had a foretaste of the good things which they were expecting under the new leadership. Mr. Dennis's reply was strong and manly, and the meeting, a most helpful one in every way, should hearten him in this new work to which he has set his hand.

In the evening a public meeting was held under the Presidency of Mr. D. R. Llewellyn. Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., speaking on certain aspects of the war, stated that he did not regret the humble part he had taken prior to the war in endeavouring to bring about more friendly relationships between this country and Germany, and he ventured to believe that the future would vindicate the attitude which he and others had taken up in this respect. While condemning war in itself as a great evil, he was fully convinced that there were circumstances in which war was justifiable and even necessary, and if ever any such circumstances existed, they did so in the case of the present war. He deprecated the suggestion which emanated from some quarters advocating a speedy peace; such a peace would be premature, and might lead ere long to a still more terrible war unless the cruel military spirit of Prussia were first broken, so giving a chance to the nobler elements in German life to assert themselves as he believed they would. Let there be no continuing of the war after the war, urged the speaker; but when the time comes let all work for real and abiding peace. Mr. Brunner, in the course of his address, referred to the splendid work done by the Rev. T. P. Spedding in visiting our young men in the Home Camps, and also eulogised the work done by Mrs. Bernard Allen and others through the medium of the Belgian Hospital Fund. The Rev. E. O. Jenkins, Cardiganshire, speaking in Welsh, gave a most stimulating and suggestive address in which he maintained that preaching, to be really efficacious, should manifest itself in the more devoted service and the nobler lives of the hearers. Mr. John Davies and the Rev. Rudolf Davis having spoken, the meeting closed with hymn and benediction. The whole series of meetings were an unqualified success and the attendances were excellent.

JUBILEE CELEBRATION AT STALYBRIDGE.

On Saturday, April 15, a Jubilee celebration was held at the Unitarian Church, Stalybridge, where for fifty years a succession of faithful men and women have been serving the cause of liberal religion with loyalty and enthusiasm, and a new organ was dedicated which is the spontaneous offering of those who have been strengthened and comforted by the services. The organ is a fine two-manual instrument, built by Mr. J. J. Binns, of Bramley, Leeds, and its erection has necessitated certain structural alterations which have greatly improved the interior of the church. There is now a chancel with handsome traceried window, designed by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, and when the complete decorative scheme is carried out in more settled times the church will be further enriched by a carved reredos, communion table, choir stalls, and pulpit in oak. The dedication took place in the afternoon in the presence of a large gathering. Mr. W. Thompson (warden) presented the key to Mr. Joseph Oliver, the eldest surviving member of the church, and Mr. Edwin Oliver received it on behalf of his father, and formally opened the organ. In doing so he mentioned that they had had a promise of £200 from the Carnegie Trust. A dedicatory prayer was offered by the minister, the Rev. J. Ellis, and an organ recital followed, given by Mr. John Brooks, A.R.C.O., organist at the Congregational Church, Stalybridge, who also accompanied Mr. Hamilton Harris, of Ashton, in several songs and recitatives. After tea in the schoolroom, a largely attended reunion was held, Mr. W. Thompson presiding. The Rev. John Ellis read messages which had been received from distant friends, including the second minister of the church, the Rev. Alex. Ashworth, and the Rev. W. G. Price, another former minister, now engaged in R.A.M.C. work, who sent a long and encouraging letter; Mr. Alfred Baker, one of the original group of twenty-three persons who founded the congregation; Mr. Isaac Carr; Mr. Jackson, a trustee; and Mr. James Hartley, editor of The Preston Herald. A telegram of congratulation was also received from the meeting of the North Cheshire Union of Sunday Schools at Stockport. Mr. Ellis stated that every one of their boys—numbering sixty—who were in camp or at the front, had been written to and invited to be present, and numerous letters of apology had been received from them. In giving a brief historical account of the church, which was outlined in our 'Men and Movements,' column last week, Mr. Ellis referred specially to the ministries of the Rev. Joseph Freeston and the Rev. Wm. Harrison, both of whom had done so much to build up the large and successful Sunday School.

The Chairman extended a welcome from the Church Committee to all friends outside their own denomination who had assisted them in connection with the Jubilee celebrations, and to the lads from the home camps who had attended in such large numbers. He (the Chairman) remembered attending the school as a boy, and he had had an unbroken connection ever since. He referred to the brave men and women who in the past gave so much of their time and money, and made great sacrifices to establish and build up the church. They now possessed a beautiful church, modernised to a certain extent, they owed not any man, and they were provided for very comfortably by endowments. What they asked now was: Have the congregation that same enthusiasm in them to keep the spiritual life of the church in a healthy condition?

Addresses were given by several other speakers, including the Revs. F. K. Freeston, A. Thornhill, and W. Short, and an excellent musical programme followed. In connection with the Jubilee celebrations special services were held on April 16, when the preachers were Dr. Mellone and the Rev. W. Short, and on April 23 conducted by the Rev. J. Ellis and the Rev. A. Thornhill.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—The Annual Sunday School Anniversary Sermons in connection with the Unitarian Chapel were preached to large congregations last Sunday by the Rev. W. T. Bushrod (of Chorley). The choir rendered special music, being assisted by the Chowbent choir and organist, Mr. T. Martin, F.R.C.O. The collection and donations amounted to over £21.

Bournemouth.—The congregation of the West Hill Road Church has lost a member of many years' standing through the unexpected death in London, on April 22, after an operation, of Mr. William Francis Hill, in his 51st year. Some thirty years ago Mr. Hill came to Bournemouth from Ilminster, where as a boy he had been brought up in the Old Meeting Sunday School. He established a successful saddlery business in the Old Christchurch Road, and at the time of his death was Third Officer in the Bournemouth Volunteer Fire Brigade, of which the present Mayor, Ald. Robson is Captain. As a Freemason he was a member of the Horsa Lodge. The Brigade gave him a Fireman's Funeral at the Cemetery on Wednesday, April 26, and the service, which was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, was very largely attended. On the following Sunday evening a Memorial Service was held in the Unitarian Church. The Brigade again attended in force, with the Mayor at their head, and a deputation of Freemasons was also present. The church was completely filled, and the singing of the large body of earnest men, with the rest of the congregation, was most impressive. Mr. Davis conducted the service and gave a memorial address, in which, as at the funeral, he spoke of their friend as a man "quiet, modest, capable, and thoroughly good at heart, diligent in business, cordial in friendship, trustworthy, staunch as a comrade, unafraid of death." At the conclusion of the sermon, the Mayor, as Captain of the Brigade, also spoke from the pulpit, and was followed by Councillor Brasier, on behalf of the Freemasons. Both speakers dwelt on the sterling qualities of the friend they were commemorating, paying a warm tribute to the straightforward simplicity and genuine kindliness of his nature. The Mayor spoke especially of the signal services he had rendered to the Brigade by his quiet faithfulness, the capacity he had shown in training the men for efficient work, and his unfailing good nature. In the course of the service a collection amounting to £3 3s. 6d. was made for the National Fire Brigade Union's Widow and Orphan Fund.

London District Unitarian Society.—The Rev. R. Travers Herford has been appointed a missionary minister of the Society. His duties will be discharged chiefly in connection with the Avondale Road Church, Peckham, where the congregation has readily agreed to the Society's proposals. Mr. Herford will commence his duties at Peckham on Sunday next, May 7.

London: Peckham.—The Rev. Douglas Robson, who has been appointed to the Unitarian Church at Oldham, terminated his four-and-a-half years' ministry at Avondale Road Church, Peckham, on April 30. At a congregational meeting held on the 29th ult., Mr. Robson was presented with a set of volumes, selected by himself, which had been specially bound and suitably inscribed. The good wishes of the congregation and of the various church institutions were expressed by several members, and suitably acknowledged by Mr. Robson.

Loughborough.—On Sunday last "White" Memorial Services were held. The preacher in the morning was the Rev. H. W. Stephenson, and in the evening the Rev. E. I. Fripp. Both services were well attended. A subscription list for a memorial fund was opened at the beginning of this year. The response has been beyond anything anticipated and has given adequate testimony to the wide-spread respect in which the memory of the three sisters, the Misses Fanny, Mary, and Charlotte White, is held.

North Midland Sunday School Association.—The Annual Meeting of the North Midland Sunday School Association was held at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, on Easter Monday. The Rev. J. C. Ballantyne conducted the service in place of the Rev. H. H. C. Jones, of Hinckley, who was prevented from being present and officiating. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. M. Wright, of Mansfield, and the paper in the evening was given by the Rev. J. W. Cock (of Newark). The Sunday School Association was represented by its President, Miss Clephan, the Manchester S.S.A. by the Rev. H. E. Perry, and the Midland S.S.A. by Mr. Lewis Lloyd.

Poole.—The Quarterly Meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association was held at Poole on Wednesday, April 12. The Business Meeting was held in the Church at 4 o'clock, and there was a good attendance. At the Public Meeting held in the Church at 7 o'clock, and presided over by Mr. W. H. Higgin, a cordial welcome was given to the Rev. G. B. Stallworthy, the speakers being the Chairman, the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, Mr. William Carter, the Rev. J. W. Thompson (Portsmouth), Alderman Herbert Carter, the Rev. W. B. Matthews, Mr. Charles Carter, the Rev. V. D. Davis (Bournemouth), and Mr. E. Lanham. Mr. Stallworthy suitably acknowledged the kind greeting accorded him, and gave an interesting address to his new congregation. He is very well known in Poole, and it is hoped that the Church may prosper greatly during his ministry.

South Shields.—The anniversary services were held at Unity Church on Sunday, April 23, when the Rev. W. H. Lambelle preached morning and evening. On Easter Tuesday the annual tea was held, followed in the evening by a public meeting, over which Mr. T. F. Bolam presided. Interesting addresses were delivered by the Revs. Alfred Hall, of Newcastle, and W. H. Lambelle.

Tenterden.—On Sunday, April 30, the Old Meeting House Sunday School was visited by the President of the Sunday School Association, Miss Clephan, who addressed the children in a manner that commanded their interest and close attention, on the subject, "Why did they attend Sunday School at all, and this School in particular?" Miss Clephan also spoke of the Hut for the Belgian Soldiers, and said how pleased she was to find that Tenterden had done so well in that regard. At the close of her address Miss Clephan was heartily thanked for her visit.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

Welfare Work among Women in Factories.

A special course of lectures on 'Welfare Work among Women in Factories' has been arranged by the Department of Social Science and Administration of the London School of Economics, for the purpose of instructing those who are preparing for temporary work in connection with munition factories, as well as those, already engaged in other forms of social work, who wish to get some fresh insight into the possibilities in the way of health, recreation, &c., which are opening out. The Welfare Worker has to deal with such problems as wages, housing, transit, canteen provision, sickness, fatigue, sanitation, recreation, and discipline. It is clear that the question of training, therefore, is of immense importance, and it is advisable that at least a year should be given to it. The lecturers will be Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree, Director of Welfare Supervision for the Ministry of Munitions; Dr. Janet Campbell, Medical Officer, Board of Education; Mr. J. St. G. Heath, Warden of Toynbee Hall, and also acting head of the department of Social Science and Administration in the absence of Prof. Urwick; Miss M. E. Wood, and Miss Constance Smith.

A New Venture in Education.

The complaint is often made that parents concern themselves too little with the problems of education, and leave their children to the control of their teachers without making sufficient inquiries about the real work of the schools. On the other hand, some people complain that the teachers pay little regard to the views which parents may hold on education, and are not anxious to help them to a better acquaintance with school methods. A new experiment is being made by the Uplands Association, a body of teachers recently organised, which may do something to alter this state of things, and will certainly be followed with interest by students of educational reform. At the Uplands Summer Meeting, to be held from August 4 to August 21, at the Normal College, Bangor, both parents and children will be welcomed, and study will be combined with recreation in a well-chosen place which affords the advantages of a quiet seaside resort in addition to the necessary educational facilities. The children will be taken for a part of each day in classes for nature study, handicrafts, and music, while the fathers and mothers will join the teachers in discussions on subjects relating to child psychology and training. Among other lecturers, Prof. J. J. Findlay (University of Manchester), Prof. Campagnac (University of Liverpool), and Prof. James Shelley (University College, Southampton), will give addresses, and practical courses in art and literature, nature study and gardening, the scientific pursuit of housekeeping, music, and eurhythmics, can be followed in the mornings by those who do not take other work from 11 to 12.30. Readers who desire further information should apply to the Secretaries at 25 Andover Road, Southsea, Hants.

A Friend of England.

The Countess Martinengo Cesaresco gently reproaches her English friends, in The Athenæum, for their lamentable ignorance in regard to modern Italian literature. Writers of distinction who are honoured throughout their own country, she points out, are often barely known, even by name, to the majority of English people, and things are very different in our day from the times of Queen Elizabeth, when no new Italian book of interest failed to get into England. In this connection she refers to the recent death of Senator Bonaventura Zumbini, a man of literary eminence who deserves to be specially remembered among us as a lifelong friend of our country. His numerous contributions to literary criticism are said to be of more than ordinary value, and in particular his essays on Milton and Bunyan should interest English readers; but, perhaps, his chief work was the one on Gladstone, "W. E. Gladstone e le sue relazioni con l'Italia," which he wrote when he was approaching his 80th year. Its only defect, says the Countess Cesaresco, "is that its title does not at all represent its importance, for it is by no means limited to the services which Gladstone rendered to the Italian cause, ...but also contains a comprehensive history of the support which United Italy received from English statesmen at the most critical moments in the accomplishment of her destinies." The volume bears the impress of a genuine love for England, and, as Prof. Torraca said in his tribute to Zumbini's memory in the Giornale d'Italia, "does honour alike to the two nations—to England, mother and guardian of liberty, and to Italy, shown to be not forgetful of what she owes to her."

Tribute to Sir F. R. Benson.

The conferring of a knighthood on Mr. Benson by the King at the Shakespeare Tercentenary performance at Drury Lane, will be regarded by all who know anything of his work in connection with the production of Shakespeare's plays as a fitting reward for the distinguished national service he has thus rendered. For thirty-three years he has devoted his life to Shakespeare, and the Rev. Stewart Headlam's suggestion, as President of the London Shakespeare League, that it would be a graceful act for his many thousands of friends and admirers to combine to thank him for what he has done, will doubtless, meet with a ready response. The scheme has the approval of a long list of eminent men, and it is suggested that an address, with signatures appended in all the towns where Sir Frank Benson has acted, should be presented to him at the close of his August season at Stratford-on-Avon.

Showy Heroes not Wanted.

General Cadorna, Chief of the Italian General Staff, according to a message received by the Wireless Press from Berne, strongly dislikes officers who ostentatiously risk their own lives and those of their men in acts of bravado which have no military value. "We have no use for heroes of romance," he is reported to have said, and when Peppino Garibaldi, who is noted for his reckless courage, sought a commission in the Italian Army after having served in the earlier part of the war as a volunteer in France, he was recommended by D'Annunzio as "one of our bravest."

"That is bad," retorted General Cadorna tersely.

"He sings and laughs amid a hail of enemy explosives," continued D'Annunzio.

"Bad, bad," replied General Cadorna.

"At the mere sight of him his men become seized with an enthusiasm that leads them to rush joyfully to death in an intoxication of holy ardour," proceeded D'Annunzio.

"Worse and worse," responded General Cadorna.

"What qualities, then, are required?" asked D'Annunzio.

"I am of the opinion," answered General Cadorna, "that he should be taught first of all not to get killed himself and not to expose his men without need. An officer who is worthy of his position does not fear death, but he does not despise life. He must be cool, methodical and serious."

Daylight Saving.

At last it is announced that the Government will shortly give a day for the discussion in the House of Commons of the system of "daylight saving" advocated by the late Mr. Willett, Sir Henry Norman, M.P., having put down a motion to that effect. The system has already been adopted, without, apparently, any real inconvenience, in Holland, Germany, and Austria-Hungary, and the French Chamber is considering the project. When the decision of the latter takes effect, some of the chief objections to the scheme will be removed, for it has been argued that the adoption of "summer season time" in Great Britain would dislocate the international arrangements of the railroads carrying the cross Channel traffic, and upset the co-ordination between boat trains and other trains on this side. Obviously, if the French Government adopt the daylight saving method, and we follow suit, all these difficulties can be easily met. Other objections which have been raised by those who regarded the idea as revolutionary and ridiculous are less important, and most of them, we think, will be balanced by considerations of health, to say nothing of the fact that, according to Mr. Herbert Samuel, the saving to the country through a yearly gain of 154 hours of effective daylight would work out at £20,000 a day.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

A MOST welcome letter has just arrived from Calais announcing that the construction of the Belgian Hut is proceeding apace and it is hoped that it will be equipped and ready for all its beneficent uses in three weeks' time. All the furniture and canteen fittings have been ordered already. The head chaplain, M. Meulepas, who has shown such a warm interest in the scheme, has written to Mrs. Allen to say how heartily he welcomes the proposal that we should send out a small staff of ladies to look after the work of the canteen and the comfort of the men. Mrs. Allen will be glad to hear from any likely applicants. They must be able to pay their own expenses, to speak French, and have had some experience in management. The work is hard—seven days a week. But the need is obvious, and any one who goes with her heart in the task will be sure to have a most interesting time.

AT the present moment this Hut is as the apple of our eye, and we want to equip it as suitably as possible, so that the hundreds of people who pass through it will feel at once that the donors have taken a great deal of trouble to make it comfortable and attractive. Among our immediate needs are pictures and decorations for the walls, a harmonium for the services on Sunday, a piano for concerts, a gramophone with a good supply of bright records, a bagatelle board, and any number of games of all sorts, indoor and out. There is a plot of waste ground at the back suitable for outdoor games, which will be a great boon during the summer.

A COMMISSION of three has been appointed to inquire into recent events in Ireland. We can find no words to describe how terrible it has all been in the crimes and mistakes which have been committed, the appalling loss of life, and the swift punishment which has overtaken the leaders. There is a general desire for clemency where it can be exercised without public danger; but we must be careful to observe the distinction between clemency and the weak palliation of crime. Some newspaper criticism during the past week has been a little lacking in restraint in this respect, and has even gone so far as to hint that the Government is out for vengeance, and is sowing the seeds of future discord with a reckless hand. In a few weeks' time when we are able to estimate the value of swift and efficient military action in restoring public confidence and saving hundreds of lives at a moment of grave peril many people will probably judge differently. The keenest sympathy for Ireland and a feeling that there were men of brilliant gifts among the conspirators must not confuse our moral judgment or cause us to extenuate the vileness of their crime. Military law is a horrible necessity, and there are strong instincts in most of us which revolt against it, but there are ci cumstances in which it would be even more horrible to do without it.

THE attitude of the Government towards the rebellion was dealt with by the Home Secretary in a speech at the National Liberal Club on Wednesday. He stated that substantial aid from Germany was clearly expected. In justification of the action taken against the rebel leaders he spoke as follows :—

> The revolt was marked by several cold-blooded, deliberate murders of policemen and of civilians, and the Government would have been guilty of unpardonable weakness if they had not meted out stern penalties to those who had been blood-guilty. Yet you may rest assured that we have in mind nothing of the nature of wholesale proscription, or of widespread executions, and I think it will be found that the number of cases in which it is necessary to enforce the extreme penalty are nearing their end, if the end has not already been reached.

ON the surface it looks as if the American reply to the German Note can hardly be accepted as more than a postponement of the definite issue for a few weeks. Germany has promised to modify her submarine policy upon certain conditions. America quite properly brushes the conditions aside and refuses to discuss them, and then proceeds to tell Germany how heartily she welcomes her promise. But clearly the promise falls to the ground with the conditions, and we are all left exactly as we were. Unless, indeed, and this is an important proviso, President Wilson has reason to believe that Germany inserted the conditions, knowing quite well that they would be unacceptable, in order to save her own face. Simply on a balance of material advantage Germany probably knows that it would do her more injury to lose the friendship of America than to relinquish her submarine policy; only she has to be careful not to dash the hopes of her own people by any open avowal of the real facts of the situation. We are aware that this is only hypothesis; but it would account for President Wilson's assumption that Germany intends to meet his demands without conditions. If it should turn out to be justified America will have won a real victory in the long diplomatic wrangle, not only for the protection of her own citizens on the high seas but for the larger principles of humanity.

The visit of the members of the Russian Duma and Council of the Empire to this country is one of deep significance for, as the Prime Minister pointed out in the welcome accorded to them on Tuesday, it is an acknowledgment in the birthplace of Parliaments that Russia has definitely entered the great fraternity of Parliaments which now almost encircles the world. Prof. Miliukoff, in acknowledging the welcome, emphasised not only the depth and power of Russian unity in the struggle, but also the moral support which they derived from their alliance with us.

> They came, he said, to England representing divergent political views and parties, but they were now united by the sacred bond of national safety and by the necessity of national defence. They represented the policy of a great nation in the greatest crisis of its national life, and nationalities in Russia, as well as political parties, all stood united. Russians were conscious that they were defending themselves against the aggression of modern barbarians, but they were more than ever convinced that they were in the right when they found Great Britain on their side. They brought this message from the Russian people :— "We wish you to know that we, too, understand what is at stake. We wish you to be assured that Russia will not surrender, but that the Russian people are ready to fight on to final success. We understand, like you, that nothing but a decisive victory can bring about an era of international solidarity. We all feel, indeed, that a whole generation cannot have been sacrificed in vain. We owe it to our dear dead to bring their exertions to fruition, and to attain the great aim for which they willingly gave their lives. Tell the British nation that we Russians are ready to endure, and that, together with you, our Allies, we look forward to a victorious consummation which will mark a decisive stage in the advance of civilised humanity."

The Oxford Chronicle for May 5 contains an interesting interview with Prof. Gilbert Murray upon his recent visit to Scandinavia. In Sweden, where he was forbidden to speak upon political subjects in public, he found that while the working men and the peasants were on the whole friendly to the Allies there is a strong pro-German element in Court circles and among the intellectual classes in the universities. This is accounted for partly by geographical position and the constant communication between the two countries. The universities are entirely under German influence, and the book trade is rather dominated by Germany, there being something like twenty German books to one English book in the shops. Then there is also the suspicion of Russia and sympathy with the Finns, and the disposition is to regard the war generally as a war between Russia and Germany. In reply to the question, "Is that sympathy with the Finns genuine ?" Prof. Murray made the following illuminating statement :—

> I think it has been largely worked up by the German propaganda. I believe I have evidence to prove that there are and have been for twenty years, German agents in Finland stirring up dissension, and German agents in the Court of Petrograd taking care that the Finns shall have something to be dissatisfied about. You have the German influence at the Court always repressive against Finland, and the German influence in Finland stirring up discontent, and actually in some cases it can be shown that these two sets of people were in connection with one another.

Speaking of the situation generally Prof. Murray specified three things which, in his judgment, have damaged us in Sweden :—

> First, there is the impression of national dissension : every attack on the Government is made much of ; secondly, the very violent anti-German articles and expressions used in the English papers, which are reproduced a good deal. One professor showed me a lot of these articles, and he said, "You see, I know Germany quite well, and I know that sort of thing is simply not true." Then alongside with that they make as much as they possibly can of all the writings of the Union of Democratic Control and of Bernard Shaw and such like. Thirdly, there is our interference with trade, although there, I was, on the whole, pleasantly surprised. There was very little tendency to deny our right to prevent imports going to Germany, and very little complaint of the blockade in principle, but a good deal of irritation at particular instances where we had either made mistakes or acted harshly. On the whole I was rather surprised at the comparative reasonableness with which they had taken the blockade.

Candour and political insight of this kind are of the deepest value and it is most welcome news that Prof. Murray is about to proceed to Washington on a similar mission of friendship and enlightenment at the request of our Government.

The Daily Telegraph has performed an important public service in calling attention to the evil effects produced by many popular cinema exhibitions upon children. An observer who recently spent two days in visiting a number of cinema theatres in various parts of London has given a description of his experience, and it is very unpleasant reading in the impression it conveys of deliberate appeal to vulgar and base instincts. The conclusion to which he comes is that the exhibitions are demoralising to children and to many who are grown up. "They make the audience," he says, "familiar with death, crime, killing, fighting, scenes of anguish, and of unhealthy excitement."

Perhaps the best commentary on this statement is the following item of police news. We take it from The Daily Telegraph of Tuesday :—

> At Mortlake Police Court yesterday a Barnes schoolboy, aged 13, admitted getting into a shop by means of putting a ladder to an upper window and stealing a cash-box containing 18*s*. Asked for an explanation, he said : "I saw it on the pictures. I saw men get a ladder, put it up to a window, break into the house, take money, and hide it in the ground. Something said in my mind when I saw the ladder, 'Go and have a try, and see if you can do the same.' I hid the money in the ground on Barnes Common, but when I went again the money had gone. If I had told my father he would have given me the biggest thrashing I ever had." In ordering the boy to be sent to an industrial school for three years, the Chairman said it was a great pity that the cinema, which could be made an influence for good, should have such a bad effect on boys.

The second report of the Central Liquor Control Board, which was issued on Saturday, shows that the various restrictive orders have resulted in a large reduction of drunkenness. In Sheffield, for instance, convictions for drunkenness have declined nearly 50 per cent, and Liverpool records that "dock labourers have openly expressed their appreciation of the absence of the temptation to drink." A very satisfactory feature of the report is a section dealing with drinking among women, compiled by a Committee of women under the chairmanship of Mrs. Creighton. They report that the undoubted increase of excessive drinking amongst women is mainly amongst those who drank before, whereas there is much evidence of improvement in the homes and in the condition of the children, and of wise spending on the part of the great majority of those in receipt of war allowances.

THE SAVOUR OF REGRET.

No doubt Mr. Lloyd George has some of the defects of the brilliant rhetorician. His fervour may sometimes outrun his judgment, and his staunchest friends would admit that his passionate advocacy may require the restraining influence of a cooler brain and more massive commonsense. But for this very reason he often sees to the heart of a moral situation in a quick flash of intuition and reveals its meaning in some sharp and memorable phrase. In his speech at Conway last Saturday, which was so largely a personal apologia, there was a phrase of this kind upon which it is good to dwell. "I have had no sympathy," he said, "with those who seem to think that because war is hateful you ought to fight with a sort of savour of regret in your actions. Doubting hand never yet struck a firm blow." No one who has ever tried to win a victory against terrible odds will doubt the truth of these words as a maxim of prudence. The disasters that dog the steps of the double-minded man are written large over the whole field of human duty. Mr. Lloyd George knows that a nation cannot wage war on these terms with any hope of success. Taking up the parable of his words we may ask whether the Christian churches of this land can hope to escape from the reproach of weak words, vacillation, and ineffectiveness, at a time when their message ought to ring forth with firm conviction and splendid audacity, if they dwell more upon the hatefulness of our duties than upon their obligation and mingle every call to heroism and sacrifice with the weakening savour of regret.

There is a growing feeling both among the churches themselves and on the part of their critics that they have not risen to the full height of their opportunity. Caught suddenly in the midst of prosperity and peace in the whirlwind of a great war their message has been a thing of shreds and patches. They have been rather sorry for themselves and have not been slow to confess it. They dwell largely upon the difficulties which confront them, and present the spectacle to an astonished world of people who are marking time, because the days are evil. They indulge dreams of the glorious things which they intend to do, when the young men come back and they can devote themselves once again to the arts of peace instead of preparing for the battle. It would be easy to specify some of the reasons for this state of feeling. It is hard for most of us to bring the curious blend of peaceableness and devotion to long life and happiness, which has been characteristic of modern Christianity, into contact with the call to arms and the glad acceptance of wounds and death for the sake of a cause. Indeed we hardly try to do so, and while we give our bodies to the performance of the stern duty, it is the ideal of long life and happiness which really possesses our hearts. Does it never strike us in the midst of this pathetic double-mindedness that all the spiritual power has gone out of our Church life, if it does not make us strong, and confident and glad for to-day's duty, however grim and terrible that duty may be. "Behold now is the accepted time! Behold now is the day of salvation." It is not in some more fortunate future but at the present moment that we must feel the light of God streaming in upon us, as we take the path from which no brave man can turn back. Once a course of action is clearly right for us it is only weakness and sentimentalism which keep us lingering among the swamps and shallows of regret.

No church is worthy to exist to-day which does not make its members pulse with the joy of sacrifice and send them forth from every hour of worship not only more resigned to their sorrows but also more keen for their duties. There is no place for sentimentality and half-heartedness. If we were persuaded that this cause is one in which good men ought not to fight, then the word "Lay down your arms!" ought to ring out clear and strong, and men should rejoice in the bonds and imprisonment which may be their portion for speaking this word from God. But for us conscience has not so decided. Probably no conviction of justice and national obligation has ever been so strong and unanimous as that which fills the mind of this country at the present time. When we are dealing with justice and duty we are also dealing with God, and if only we believe in God enough and are thinking more of his will than of our happiness, there will be no hesitation in bringing the thought of Him into the grimmest task and mingling the joy of his presence with all our actions. The one thing that will be intolerable to us is that there should be the savour of regret in bearing the burden and fighting the battle which we cannot refuse without unfaithfulness.

Many readers of these words will probably be eager to remind us that the churches have a great part to play at the present time in curbing unruly passions and keeping men loyal to ideals of pity and kindness. That is a thing which we want never to forget, and we are deeply conscious that those of us who are most easily kindled with admiration for warlike deeds or burn with indignation against wrong need to listen to the pleadings of gentleness and sympathy. But there are two ways in which this message may be spoken, and one of them seems to us to be far more effective than the other. The one is that of the man who watches the struggle from outside and feels the chief burden laid upon him to be one of warning. He is always a little sad about the national spirit, and without much skill in moral perspective finds a good deal more to blame than to praise. We fear that very few people listen to him or are the better for his counsels, and his words are soon lost on the thin air. The other method is that of the practice of kindness by men who are themselves heart and soul in the struggle. We have pointed it out before, but we can hardly do so too often, that it is the indolent or the vacant heart which is most exposed to the attacks of hatred and malice. The surest protection against these vices is to be occupied with good. We shall never kill the instincts of cruelty or the desire of vengeance simply by speaking against them or pretending that the evil in the world is less ugly and menacing than it really is. They will die a natural death in every heart that is filled with the vision of its duty and rejoices to be a helper of the world. Is this the reason why the great soldier is often the tenderest and most pitiful of men? If we want to keep ourselves unstained by wrong and sensitive to every opening of good, there is at the present moment only one thing for us to do. It is not enough for us to touch unpleasant duties with our finger-tips. We must take them into our lives and glorify them by our faithfulness. We have made our decision, and because we believe that decision is right it has a claim upon our full strength. There must be no hesitation about fresh sacrifices, no weakness of will, and no savour of regret.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

But apt the mind or fancy is to rove
Uncheck'd, and of her roving is no end ;
Till warn'd, or by experience taught, she learn,
That not to know at large of things remote
From use, obscure and subtle, but to know
That which before us lies in daily life,
Is the prime wisdom ; what is more, is fume,
Or emptiness, or fond impertinence,
And renders us in things that most concern
Unpractised, unprepared, and still to seek. Milton.

Friend, thou hast been a citizen in this great city ; and what matters it whether for five years or three ? The law is the same for us all. Where is the hardship, then, if it be no tyrant's stroke, no unjust judge, that sends thee into exile, but the same Nature that brought thee hither, even as the master of the show dismisses the mummer that he put on the stage ? "But my rôle is unfinished. There are five acts and only the three are gone !" Thy words are true ; but in life three acts are all the play. For He decrees it shall end, who was once the author of thy existence, and now of thy dissolution. But thou art guiltless of both. Then depart at peace with all men ; for He who bids thee go is at peace with thee.

Marcus Aurelius.

May the grace of the Lord sanctify you, and preserve you from all evil.

May it drive away from you everything that is hurtful, and purify your souls and bodies.

May it bind you to one another with the bond of charity, and may the peace of God rule in your hearts. Amen.

VERSE.

A SON'S ANSWER.

(To the Verses, 'The Mother and the Sons,' Inquirer, April 8).

This, from a son to the Motherland that sent him,
Sang to him and loved him, long years ago,
And in her need to a Sister-nation lent him,
Drilled him, and armed him, and bade him go.

Happy your heart be, Motherland !
Though far on foreign field, or in the deep,
Full many of your dearest children sleep ;
They gave to God the fullness of their prime,
And, fearing nothing, fell before their time,
His will to do, His purposes to keep.

Tell to the children, Motherland,
The tale of how, when came to you the call,
You sent their elder brothers, each and all,
And how they went, to whatsoever clime
Their duty called them ; that in their own time
The younger brothers shall not fear to fall.

Comfort your daughters, Motherland,
When silent evening falls upon the hills,
And only in that life a longing fills
The empty heart where Love once held his throne,
And now no longer comes to claim his own,
And vainly April brings the daffodils.

Comfort your daughters, Motherland,
Though years of silent sorrow they must bear,
Though lonely, ay, and long, the road they fare,
Yet may they always keep the same old smile
To meet, in God's own time—a little while—
In God's own time, the same old answer—there.

And to the Maker, Motherland,
Give thanks for that He chose your hands to do,
For strength to hold to that same purpose true,
For love for those we leave within your care—
And, in the silence, just a word of prayer,
That we, your sons, be worthy found of you !

(This, from a Son to the Motherland that taught him
Long years ago when he nestled at her knee,
Till in his soul the sacred summons sought him,
For God, for justice, and the world to be !)

SHAKESPEARE'S TRAGEDIES.

Shakespeare's life, so far as we are acquainted with it, was not tragic. Life was probably hard and painful for him in early days. He grew up in a home where his father was losing position and power. His youth was not passed in bracing poverty, but in an atmosphere of decaying prosperity and humiliating failure.

If Shakespeare loved or believed in his father, he must have felt something tragic in the declining fortunes of the family. It must have weighed upon his spirits and impressed on him the feeling of something unjust in the world. He would not admit that it was his father's fault that misfortune had come upon them.

But Shakespeare himself was a most conspicuous success. He gained money, friendship, and honour. He had the great happiness of restoring his father to comfort and dignity. He gained for him a coat of arms and the proud appellation of "gentleman." He bought himself a fine house and much land in his native town, and was able to retire there in the full vigour of middle age. He was able to achieve this prosperity and power while fulfilling his genius. Many geniuses, if they make money for their families and themselves, are obliged to waste their talents in uncongenial tasks. Shakespeare made his fortune by doing the things which he could do best. In expressing himself as actor and dramatist he achieved most satisfactory worldly success. He had that

Which should accompany old age
As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends.

He died too soon when 52 years old, but he had lived a full and interesting life. He had enjoyed himself immensely.

He had, like a character in Browning,

Sighed deep, laughed free,
Starved, feasted, despaired, been happy.

He had felt as he describes in 'Hamlet,' "What a piece of work is man ! How noble in reason, how infinite in faculty, in form and moving how express and admirable. In action how like an angel ; in apprehension how like a god." He had felt the fun and laughter and humour of life. He knew the strength of noble friendship and the deep delight of love. His comedies are full of this feeling of the goodness and justice of the world. There are difficulties and trials, of course, but they only make men appreciate this world the more and strengthen their characters. 'All's well that ends well' is a title which might be given to any of his comedies. The world does not always run smoothly, but it is a very good sort of place. The fools in it are laughable, and there is enough of the devil in it to make it exciting, but not enough to do any real harm. Shakespeare's comedies are full of this quiet delight in life, this varied sympathy with all kinds of men, and especially with a recognition of the ideal in women. Comedy always means a serene clear sense of the fundamental justice of the nature of things. Dante's

'Divina Commedia' is not a comedy in the ordinary sense; but it shares with Shakespeare's comedies this conviction of a fundamental harmony and justice in things. What ought to happen does happen. There is no unexplained "surd" outside the economy of God. If any reader feels that the punishment of sinners in hell is too great for their sin, that they are unfairly treated, then, for him, it would become a tragedy. Many feel this in reading of Paolo and Francesca in hell; but I doubt if Dante meant us to feel it. We are intended to feel the pathos but not the injustice of their punishment. Evil is where it ought to be—in hell, receiving the exact penalty which it deserves from a supreme wisdom and a perfect Love. If we can share this faith with Dante then his Hell is not a Tragedy. It represents evil conquered and punished, and the eternal laws of right vindicated and triumphant.

Shakespeare, in his great tragedies, makes us realise that he has awakened to the injustice of the world and to the existence of naked evil. It is not merely that good lives are lost by fate or accident, but that there are devilish elements in men. People are not merely making mistakes when they injure others. There is something worse than blindness or folly in the hearts of men. Mr. Campbell, in the days before the war, once described sin as "a mistaken quest for God." Shakespeare had no doubt often thought of sin in the same way, but in less theological language. But when he drew Iago and Goneril and Regan and the King in 'Hamlet,' he knew better. Some bitter experience had opened his eyes to the devilish in man. It did not make him cynical about men and women generally. He could draw that type of man in 'Timon of Athens' who is foolish enough to become a cynic because some people disappoint him. Shakespeare's faith in goodness was deepened through his awakening to the reality of evil; but we can feel something intensely painful in his spirit at this time. His confidence in life and in men and women had met with some great disillusionment. Like Hamlet, he had become aware of treachery and crime in those whom he had trusted. He had discovered that "a man could smile and smile and be a villain."

To some people this discovery comes easily, but to Shakespeare it was a shattering experience. His was not exactly an unsuspicious, still less a credulous mind; but he belonged to the catholic type of intelligence which finds something to enjoy in great varieties of human nature.

Men like Falstaff and Sir Toby Belch delighted Shakespeare, and in more vulgar and baser people like Malvolio and Shallow and Trinculo he found much to laugh at and nothing to arouse intense hatred or condemnation. His point of view on life is that of the Duke in 'As You Like It,'

Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which like a toad ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head.
And this our life exempt from public haunt
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in everything.

To find good in everything and in everybody was Shakespeare's natural instinct. When such a mind is forced to recognise the existence of real evil in the world, something that cannot be laughed at or studied as an interesting trait in human nature but something essentially devilish—it is a tremendous challenge. He could not say about Hamlet or Othello or Lear, "Sweet are the uses of adversity." Lear in the storm can suggest it is a good thing, and that he is learning sympathy; but we do not feel that Goneril and Regan are explained as teachers of sympathy to their father.

There is no tragedy in learning a useful lesson under discipline ending in the final conquest of good over evil. The tragedy is in the apparent waste of good and in the reality of evil. Evil in Shakespeare's tragedies is not something which merely braces men and women: it is capable of hurting and hindering them. "We are confronted," says Mr. Bradley, "with the inexplicable fact or the no less inexplicable appearance of a world travailing for perfection but bringing to birth together with glorious good an evil which it is able to overcome only by self-torture and self-waste. And this fact or appearance is Tragedy."

This sense of waste and loss, this devilish power of evil is to be felt in Shakespeare's greatest tragedies. It is true that he always makes the villain suffer and die in the end, but reversing the Bible and Milton's story of Samson, the Philistine, in dying, has the power to pull down the Temple of the true God and crush the innocent and virtuous in its ruins.

And yet the effect of Shakespeare's great tragedies is never depressing. We never close the book with Gloster's words upon our lips,

As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods,
They kill us for their sport.

There is no attempt to give comfort or to explain evil. There is little reference to another world where all will be set right. Kent says:—

I have a journey shortly to go.

And of Ophelia it is said:—

May flights of angels take thee to thy rest.

But practically the tragedy begins and ends on the earth without a thought of compensation in the life beyond. The Epilogue to all Shakespeare's tragedies might be given in the words of Hamlet,

The rest is silence.

But the total effect of the tragedies is to vindicate the powers of love and righteousness. They are felt to be triumphant even in defeat and death. There is an element in Shakespeare's tragedies which has something of the same effect upon the mind as the death of Jesus. They make for serene faith and reverence, and not for despair.

Prof. Royce, writing upon the Atonement, expresses something which we feel in the tragedy of Lear as well as in the central tragedy of Christianity. "No baseness, no cruelty of treason so base shall enter into our human world but that loyal love shall be able in due time to oppose to just that deed of treason its fitting deed of atonement. The deed of atonement shall be so wise and purifying in its efficiency that the spiritual world after the atoning deed shall be better, richer, more triumphant amid all its unavoidable tragedies than it was before the traitor deed was done."

We have in Shakespeare no logical theory suggesting it is right and well that evil should be here. But when evil does its worst we feel most deeply the greatness of human nature and the glory of love. We feel the tears in things, but we feel that the best triumph even in death, and that there is no cause for despair. Without a word of God or immortality, we feel the rule of justice and the eternity of the things of the spirit.

THE CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—As a subscriber to, and constant reader of your paper for many years, I am always interested in the Notes on your first and second pages. The fairness and impartiality, however, which you usually display in these Notes disappear when you touch on the above subject. A few weeks ago I ventured to criticise your remarks on the conscientious objector, and last week your allusion to the subject was st ll more regrettable. After alluding to the leaders of the Irish Rebellion, you speak of the "ill-assorted rabble of their followers," and characterising some of them as "dreamy idealists, feeble both in brain and in imagination," say that "in England they would probably have been conscientious objectors." Possibly you may be able to explain this last phrase, but it appears to me as if it were simply meant to be offensive. On the one hand you have men who conscientiously object to taking human life under any circumstances. On the other are the followers and partisans of men who caused hundreds if not thousands of innocent people to be killed and wounded, a great part of a populous city to be set on fire, and two million pounds worth of damage to be done, and you suggest that it is only the accident of being born on the east or the west of the Irish Sea that has caused the difference in the characters of the e two sets of men.—Yours, &c.

[Our remark was made in order to enable our readers to put some of the young men in the Sinn Fein movement in their proper category. They are not by nature dangerous criminals, but men fanatical for their own opinions, absorbed in one-sided views of setting the world right, and quite incapable of bringing their own course of action into relation with the general good of the community.

We think that on this side of the Channel they would probably have found some field of exercise for their mental idiosyncrasies very different from the violent courses into which they have been betrayed. It is more a question of mental quality and a lack of steady imagination in public affairs than of the precise opinions which are held. Any one who has an intimate acquaintance with both English and Irish life will probably agree with us that it does make a vast difference in regard to the way in which similar traits of character express themselves on which side of the Channel a man happens to be, just because his social and historical environment are quite different.—ED. of INQUIRER].

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE RIVALS OF CHRISTIANITY.

FORERUNNERS AND RIVALS OF CHRISTIANITY. By F. Legge. Cambridge, at the University Press. 2 vols, 25*s*. net.

FOR private devotion the New Testament is still a book apart, too deep and individual in the influence it exerts and the memories it kindles to be compared with anything else. For the historian, however, this is no longer the case. He knows that in many respects it is the product of its time and bears the impress of mighty spiritual and intellectual forces, which lie beyond its own borders. The old books upon the life and times of Jesus Christ, which dwelt chiefly upon the social habits of the people of Palestine, the beliefs of the Pharisees and the ceremonial of the Temple, have given place to studies of the religion and civilisation of the Græco-Roman world, in which nascent Christianity and the Judaism of which it formed a part were exposed to multitudinous influences both of attraction and repulsion. In recent years the work of research has been particularly active in two directions. The first is concerned with the literature and popular beliefs of apocalyptic Judaism; the second with the Oriental cults of the Empire. It may, perhaps, be pleaded that it is only the first which has a direct bearing upon the study of the New Testament, though the influnece of the ritual of the Mysteries upon the language and practice of St. Paul is not a matter to be dismissed without careful investigation. When, however, we turn to the early Christian Church, as it existed in the age which succeeded that of the Apostles, we find it living a precarious life in presence of numerous and powerful rivals, and when at last it emerges victorious we have to ask ourselves how much it owed to the strength of its resistance and how much to its extraordinary powers of absorption.

It is no easy task to bridge the chasm between the New Testament, with its moral passion and its indifference to ceremonial, and the sacramental worship of later days, until we realise the strength and fertility of the influences which flowed in as tributaries into the central stream. The worship of Isis with its priests, called by Apuleius "a sacred soldiery," its crowd of minor officials, singing-men, wardrobe keepers, and the rest, and its highly organised monastic system, presents at first sight far more points of contact with familiar Christian practices than anything which meets the eye either in the teaching of Christ or the picture of the primitive community in Jerusalem. The suggested inference cannot be either accepted or rejected without careful study, and it is a rich storehouse of materials for this purpose that Mr. Legge has provided in the two volumes before us. Hitherto it has been difficult for the ordinary reader to discover these materials for himself. They have been hidden away in costly monographs or the transactions of learned societies, and it is seldom that they have been available in translations. The work opens with two chapters on the conquests of Alexander and the Alexandrian Divinities, and then proceeds to give an account of Gnosticism in its various schools, Marcion, the worship of Mithras, and Manes and the Manichaeans, the object being not to discuss or criticise their teachings from a philosophical or theological point of view, but to give some account of them as actual systems of religious worship, drawing as far as possible upon contemporary records and extant fragments of liturgies and hymns. The chapter on the Manichaeans is particularly welcome because it makes a great deal of material, which has only been discovered recently, easily accessible. These strange documents, which have been disinterred after many centuries of oblivion, throw a flood of light upon the austerity and moral passion of a form of belief which has suffered more than most heresies from the triumphant abuse of its foes.

We agree with Mr. Legge's conclusion that the supremacy of Christianity in the West, after every allowance has been made for its power of absorbing alien elements, was emphatically a case of the survival of the fittest. It strikes us, however, that while he is deeply conscious of the influence of the Græco-Roman world upon the growth of the Christian scheme of ritual, he is inclined to minimise it unduly when he alludes to the development of doctrine. Here, we believe, he is wrong, and that the intellectual dependence is in reality just as close, though perhaps necessarily less striking. Do then either the traditional ceremonies or the traditional dogmas of the church belong, we will not say to the primitive deposit but to the creative spirit and intrinsic spiritual genius of Christianity? May not a religion, which has shown such a singular power of selection and absorption hitherto, throw off many of the accretions of a world, whether Græco-Roman or mediæval, which has passed away, and fashion a new vesture for itself, as it feels the ferment of strange thoughts and aspirations in its blood and knows that it must face strong and unvanquished rivals in the modern world? These are not the questions of a sceptic. They spring from glorious confidence in the vitality of faith.

THERE are two ways in which the reviewer may deal with Prof. J. H. Morgan's LEAVES FROM A FIELD NOTE BOOK (London, Macmillan & Co., 5*s*. net.). The first is to cull a selection of the most vivid and moving passages in order to whet the reader's appetite for more. The other, more modest, but we hope not less effective, is to tell the reader with all possible emphasis to go and find them out for himself. It is a book full of heartening and delight, brimming over with good humour, good stories, and the comradeship of brave men and women. We wish that we could be of their company, but Mr. Morgan makes us free for a few moments of their laughter and tears and undaunted courage, and we are better for the experience. We know no more human book than this about the war.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MISS MATILDA SHARPE.

THE many friends and former pupils of Channing House School must have been profoundly moved on hearing of the passing away last week of Miss Matilda Sharpe, co-founder with the late Rev. Robert Spears of the school at which many of the daughters of our Unitarian families have received their education, and the inspiration which has sent so many of them out to do good work in the world—the world which needs that zeal for the good cause always one of the striking characteristics of her strong and active personality. Few enough are the souls housed in bodies as frail and almost insignificant looking as hers, which possess her passionate devotion to ideals, her more than willingness to deny herself, to live simply, dress almost at no cost, in order that she might give more and more of her substance in the cause she held dear. The girls, her pupils, must have of the best that she could give, and if necessary, must have it free of cost, if only the desire to learn was there. How she believed in the good and how often she found it where others had seen only idleness, obstinacy, and frivolity! Her "but you are such a good girl, I am sure you do not really like to be silly and to waste anything so precious as time," evoked a shamefaced but genuine effort to be what she expected you to be.

She had a wonderful knack of getting straight to the heart of a difficult problem and showing the principle on which the solution must be based. Is it high-minded? Is it kind? These were the touchstones by which she tested actions. Her enthusiastic love of learning, especially of the classics and the great masters in art and literature, was an education in itself to the young minds around her, while her fund of humour and of quaint and witty sayings added to the attraction they felt towards her.

Channing House School is now thirty-one years old, and for the whole of that time it has been treated by its founder as only a loving and generous and devoted parent could treat a loving child. Many a home would to-day be saddened by her going were it not for the knowledge that her spirit lives on "in lives made better by her presence."

L. Talbot.

Mrs. Titford writes :—May I add a few words of tribute to Miss Matilda Sharpe. As the Hon. Secretary of Unity Church Ladies' Committee for twenty-one years, I was frequently in contact with our late friend, who, for a long period, voluntarily superintended the Day School at Islington. I had known her from my girlhood and saw her last only a few weeks ago. From her I invariably received courtesy, kindness, and sincere friendship. She and her sister gave me valuable assistance in the compilation of my 'History of Unity Church, Islington,' in which they took the greatest interest. It was a constant source of pleasure to her to talk of old times and old friends, especially of the Warren family. She continued her interest in Unity Church until her end. It may not be generally known that Miss Matilda Sharpe was an accomplished artist, and formerly an exhibitor at the Royal Academy.

MISS LALOR.

The death of Miss Lalor, which took place last week, removes one of the oldest members of the congregation of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, and revives many gracious memories of Holly Hill School. Two of her most intimate friends have sent us the following gracious tribute to a life whose strength was in its quiet faithfulness :—

A few old friends have thought that as I was longer at Holly Hill than any other pupil (nine years in all) it would not be unfitting for me to recall something of Miss Lalor's life in the school. When, in 1860, I went there, a child of 8, she was still a pupil herself, ten years my senior, and was treated so exactly like the rest of us that it was long before I discovered that "Eveleen" was Mrs. Lalor's daughter. About a year afterwards she ceased to be a pupil, and helped in teaching and in other ways; but I cannot remember to what extent. Later, Mrs. Lalor resigned to her the cares of housekeeping. There is little of incident to dwell upon; she was just "Eveleen," always at hand, full of love and kindness to all. With the thoughtlessness of youth we, perhaps, hardly realised how many of the pleasures of girlhood she was missing, for she seemed invariably contented, and was never heard to say an unkind or angry word. Miss Lalor occupied a most difficult position, and in looking back on those years it fills me with amazement and admiration that one of her age could hold the scales of loyalty so evenly balanced—loyalty to her mother and her aunt (Miss Banks), and loyalty to us girls. She was always amongst us and knew of our escapades and naughtiness, yet never was there a shadow of fear that she would "tell tales." If Eveleen had to report any wrongdoing it would be from a sense of duty only—accompanied, I feel sure, by "a recommendation to mercy." Even then the keynotes of her character were self-effacement, unselfishness, and fidelity. Those now distant schooldays are, however, somewhat eclipsed in memory by the subsequent long friendship between us, founded on our great love for Miss Banks. Of the beautiful devotion of niece to aunt another must speak who was more intimately connected than I with the later life of our dear friend.

Florence Hawksley Musgrave.

Here speaks that old friend and neighbour of the care Miss Lalor took of the little sanatorium at Hampstead for invalids from Bethnal Green, together with thoughtful kindness to other friends who needed such as she could give, though timidity due to her much regulated life in her early days prevented her striking out in new directions. Her absorption in a great friendship rounded up her life as described above in "self-effacement, unselfishness, and fidelity."

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Eighty-First Annual Meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society was held in the Rosslyn Hill Chapel Hall, Hampstead, on Monday evening, May 8, Mr. Philip Roscoe, Treasurer, in the chair. The Report of the Committee was read by the Hon. Secretary, the Rev. F. K. Freeston, who pointed out that owing to the great increase in the cost of paper and printing it had been necessary to curtail the number of pages. The difficulties of the present time and the loss of so many members who are serving their country at the front have, of course, made special demands upon the energy and devotion of those who are carrying on the work, and this year the Committee have to report the death of thirteen subscribers and friends of the Mission. With great kindness the Committee and subscribers of the Charles Street Institute, Oxford, having found it necessary to give up the work, decided to forward their balance of £74 to the London District Mission Society, a generous and welcome act which has been gratefully acknowledged.

The Treasurer's Report, read by Mr. Roscoe, shows that the income for the year, apart from donations to the Poor's Purse, was £965 19*s.* 2*d.* as against £1,152 in 1914. Subscriptions and donations have decreased considerably, while collections have increased by £12 12*s.* The expenditure for the year, apart from donations to the Poor's Purse, was £1,438 2*s.* 9*d.*, which is £20 16*s.* 2*d.* more than the expenditure of 1914. The Society has received during the year the large sum of £675 in legacies, and has invested £408 18*s.* in the purchase of War Loan. Mr. Roscoe pleaded for increased subscriptions, and pointed out that, as most of the expenses incurred were recurrent ones, very little could be effected in the way of economy unless they were seriously to curtail their useful activities. He had been filled with admiration at the way in which the subscribers had kept up their subscriptions at a time of such difficulty.

The Missionaries' Reports briefly chronicle another year of patient, unceasing, and courageous work in a spirit of cheerfulness which it is a pleasure to record. The Rev. F. Summers (Dingley Place) points to two causes for anxiety which call for earnest effort on the part of all who have any influence as social workers or politicians—the increase of lawlessness and rough behaviour among growing youths, resulting in much juvenile crime, and the miseries of the sick and old, or widows with children, who are suffering intensely as a result of the increase in prices, and do not share the prosperity which the war has brought to numbers of the young and vigorous workers. The chief feature of the Rev. W. H. Rose's report is the interesting account given of the North St. Pancras School for Mothers and Infant Welfare Centre. This excellent work is being carried on with sympathy and efficiency, and it is hardly necessary to point out the importance of enlisting helpers for national service on behalf of the babies, the most innocent class of sufferers under our social system. The Rev. A. Golland (Bell Street) emphasises "the goodness of the people," and "the general balance and sanity of the poorest and most ignorant of our local population," the real understanding of whom is the first necessity of those who would try to "improve" their moral and religious character. This goodness is "born on the defensive, and ceaselessly challenged by those social conditions which we are striving to 'ameliorate'"; but it is there in abundance, sturdy and splendid. More regular work, better food, and lessened anxiety, or a change in the direction of anxieties, have tended to improve the general health of the district around Bell Street; but here, too, the lot of the old age pensioners and the sick and infirm is harder than ever, and some are on the verge of destitution.

The adoption of the Report and Statement of Accounts was moved from the chair, and seconded by Mr. Harold Wade, who said that if diaries could be kept by the Missionaries we should certainly be surprised to know how many people came to them for guidance, especially at the present time when the husbands of so many women were at the front. He was sure that the Missionaries gave their help and advice to the fullest extent. The support which the Missions had given to the war was really wonderful. The Boys' Brigades, and organised institutions of that kind, had sent their members to a man, and he felt that men who had answered the call so readily, and who were facing death so heroically for their country, would come home morally and spiritually strengthened, and be a great help to their institutions.

Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter moved the second resolution, expressing confidence in the principles of the London Domestic Mission, and appreciation of the earnest and faithful labours of the missionaries and their wives and helpers. Dr. Carpenter spoke in warm terms of the faithfulness and tenacity of purpose with which the Missionaries had borne their burden, which must have been increasingly heavy during the past year, in spite of all the difficulties resulting from the war. He had been greatly encouraged by Mr. Golland's words about the inherent goodness of those whom it was their purpose to help, and they recalled the similar testimony borne by the late Canon Barnett, whose name could never be mentioned in this connection save with honour and affection. When they tried to realise all the daily and hourly sacrifices which the life of poverty entailed, and the difficulties that had to be overcome with inadequate housing, little leisure, and scarcely any prospect for the future but old age pensions or the workhouse, he was filled with wonder at the way in which in many millions of cases the heavy burden is borne. A Frenchman who was recently asked what he was doing for his country, replied, "I am surviving." That was one of the functions which their Missions were performing during this crisis; but what were they going to do with their survival? What contribution were they going to make to the public opinion which would control the issues of the war and the social conditions which will require to be reorganised and reconstructed at the end of the war? The great progress which had been made in the conception of ideals of social service, and the enormous amount of voluntary help which this crisis had called forth must have been prepared for by long, though less conspicuous forms of moral energy, and one of the problems which would confront them in the future was—how were they to capture, for moral and social work, the unlimited energies which were now being utilised in carrying on the war? He was persuaded that one of the things that it was most necessary to do was to make the community realise that we were constantly engaged in an age-long war with poverty, and the evils engendered by poverty, and that the casualties they were all deploring now were not as numerous as those which occurred year by year from preventible causes. Dr. Carpenter dwelt on the necessity for grappling with the problems of infant mortality, intemperance, sickness, malnutrition, the care of the aged and of the lunatics and feeble-minded, giving figures which proved, without any comment, what a vast amount of work lies before those engaged in social regeneration. But all this, he said, must be attempted in the spirit of love, without which all reforms were of no avail and no souls could be saved. It was for this reason that the personal gifts which the Missionaries must possess were so important, gifts of sympathy, patience, courage, faith and hope. That call which had rung through the ages, "Be ye also perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect," Jesus had not been afraid to address to the poor and ignorant, and it embodied the real purpose of the work of moral and religious improvement to which they were devoting their lives. They were engaged in what was, perhaps, the hardest of all tasks—they were carrying the light into the dark places of our civilisation, and trying to harmonise the conflicting elements in lives of strain and temptation and sorrow, in a great vision of the future, with that central peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation.

The Rev. Henry Gow, in seconding the resolution, referred to the early beginnings of the Domestic Mission Movement, and the men who had initiated it in no spirit of superiority, but with a sense of simple brotherhood, a broad and absolutely unsectarian faith, a belief in the gospel of Christ which they felt was the essential need of all men. Referring to the present crisis, he expressed his conviction that many of the class distinctions which had created such bitter antagonisms before the war were being obliterated in the trenches, where rich and poor were suffering and facing death together as comrades, and men were learning to understand each other better than they had ever had an opportunity of doing before. This was going to result in a new religious conception of brotherhood among all types and classes of men in our country.

The Missionaries, in replying, spoke of the special needs of their several Missions, and expressed their cordial faith in the objects for which they were striving and the people among whom they worked.

A resolution, thanking the Committee and officers for their services and re-electing them for the current year, was proposed by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, seconded by Mr. Edmund F. Grundy, and carried. A vote of thanks to the Minister and Committee of the Rosslyn Hill congregation for their hospitality, proposed by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, and seconded by Mr. Wilfrid S. Tayler, brought the proceedings to a close.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

It is announced that Dr. J. E. Carpenter has consented to be nominated as President of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. In his speech at the Annual Meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society at Hampstead last Monday Dr. Carpenter referred in emphatic terms to the need of vigorous temperance propaganda at the present time.

At the Annual Meeting of the Unitarian Temperance Association, which will be held on June 16, there will be a discussion on 'The Next Step Forward,' with special reference to the Nationalisation of the Drink Traffic. Among the speakers, in addition to Dr. Carpenter, will be Mr. J. M. Hogge, M.P., and Mr. Arnold Lupton.

The Rev. A. W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden, is to be the new President of the Sunday School Association in succession to Miss Clephan, of Leicester. We referred recently in this column to Mr. Fox's scholarly attainments. He is also an enthusiastic Sunday School worker, and in the large inter-denominational classes which he has conducted in Todmorden has been a most successful trainer of teachers.

It is announced that Dr. John Hunter will continue his Sunday morning services at the Æolian Hall, New Bond Street, W., till the end of June, when they will be discontinued for the summer vacation. His Memorial Sermon on Dr. Stopford Brooke is to be published, and will be ready shortly.

At the Annual Meeting of the congregation of Hope Street Church, Liverpool, it was announced that Dr. S. A. Mellor's ministry is meeting with many encouraging signs of success—forty new members having been enrolled during the past twelve months. We welcome this cheerful and confident note at a time when many churches are making the war an excuse for pitching all their announcements in a minor key.

The Rev. R. F. Rattray, M.A., Ph.D., of Hindley, is announced to give a course of ten lectures on the 'History of the Philosophy of Religion' in connection with the Board of Biblical Studies of Liverpool University.

In connection with the Summer School at Meadville, U.S.A., the Rev. R. P. Farley, B.A., is announced to deliver a course of lectures on 'Social Experiments in Continental Europe.' The school opens on August 14 and closes on September 15. The general topic for the various courses of lectures is "A Social Programme and How to Realise It: in the Local Community, in the State, in the Nation, and by International Organisation."

The Easter card—'The Mother and the Sons'—which appeared in our columns on April 8, brought in the sum of £2 7*s.* 3*d.*, which has been forwarded by the author, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, to the Sunday School Belgian Hut Fund.

The Rev. Bernard J. Snell is to be the new President of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He has long been known as a steady liberal in theology as much averse to revolution as he is to reaction. Mr. Snell, who will be 60 this year, was formerly minister of St. Paul's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and of Richmond Chapel, Manchester. He began his long and notable ministry at Brixton in 1891.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—The Rev. John Hinkins, M.A., has resigned his charge at the Unitarian Church, and will close his ministry there at the end of May.

Bolton, Bank Street Chapel.—The following statement was made by the minister to the congregation on Sunday, May 7:—"The events of the last few weeks impressed me anew, as they must have done all of us, with a sense of the gravity of the crisis at which we have arrived. I felt that the time had come when I ought to offer myself for active military service. Accordingly I consulted the officers of the church, and had taken preliminary steps to enlist, when I became aware through consultation with the General Purposes Committee, and conversations with representative members of the congregation, that there was a strong and widespread feeling that it was my duty to remain at my post as minister of Bank Street Chapel. While there was no indication of any desire to overrule my own sense of duty, but on the contrary the most generous and emphatic insistence that I must be left free to decide the question for myself, I nevertheless realised throughout that my position as the minister of a large congregation does not leave me free to act as I might do in other circumstances. The fact that there is so strong and general a feeling must be a most important factor in my decision, and it has directly led me to revise my original conviction that the time had come for me to undertake military service, and to accept as my most important national work in this crisis the discharge of my ministerial duties. I am very deeply impressed by this indication of the trust and confidence of the congregation. I recognise that it imposes on me a very grave responsibility, and I can only say that I will do my utmost in this branch of national service, as I should have striven to do had I felt justified in carrying out my intention to enlist for military service."

London: Hackney.—Under the management of the Hackney Branch of the Women's League, a successful Jumble Sale was held on Tuesday, May 9, which realised £14 16*s.* 6*d.* On Wednesday, May 17, a Concert is being given by the Girls' Own Brigade and friends in aid of the Belgian Hut Fund.

Oldham.—A meeting was held at the Unitarian Church on Saturday evening, May 6, to welcome the Rev. D. W. Robson, the newly appointed minister. Mr. A. Hepworth, president of the congregation, occupied the chair, and gave Mr. and Mrs. Robson a warm greeting on behalf of the congregation. Mr. H. F. Barnett, superintendent of the Sunday school, and Miss Dornan, on behalf of the ladies of the congregation, added their welcome. Mr. H. J. Broadbent spoke as President of the Manchester District Association, and Mr. A. Slater as President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. A speech full of encouragement and good feeling was also made by the Rev. W. S. McLauchlan, Mr. Robson's predecessor at Oldham, who has removed to Sale. In the course of his reply Mr. Robson remarked that, although he was born in London, his mother was a Scotswoman and he had northern blood in him. His last district at Peckham was associated with the names of Ruskin, Browning and Goldsmith, and more recently it had become known as the birthplace of Charlie Chaplin. It was not the chimneys of Oldham that had brought him to Lord Street, but the deeper things that had their centre in the chapel. He had heard of the blunt speech of Oldhamers, but he would far sooner have things said to his face than behind his back; he could stand a good deal and was not thin-skinned. He appreciated their welcome as also did his wife. She was anxious to assist in whatever work she could, and he was quite willing to take his share of the work, but he would need the help and assistance of all of them.

Sheffield: Unity Church.—To the architectural and other attractions of the Unity Church, Crookesmoor Road, Sheffield, has now been added that of a restored and enlarged organ, thanks to the generosity of Mrs. W. R. Stevenson, whose interest in Unitarianism and music are both of a keen character. The organ, which has thus become practically a new one, has just been opened. The dedication service was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Upper Chapel, Norfolk Street, the sermon being preached by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. After the service a recital was given by Mr. J. A. Rodgers, who had selected a programme excellently suited for displaying the good qualities of the organ. A tablet fixed upon it bears the inscription: "This organ was rebuilt by the Congregation in the year 1916 as a tribute to the faithful work of W. R. Stevenson as organist, 1881-1916. The additions were given by his wife Ellen." The present organ incorporates that from the old Upperthorpe Church. It now possesses thirty stops, fourteen new ones having been added at the expense of Mrs. Stevenson.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The Annual Meeting was held at Westgate Chapel, Wakefield, on Saturday, May 6, 1916. The Business Meeting was held in the afternoon, at which there was a moderate attendance. The Annual Report and Balance Sheet were read and adopted, the officers were thanked for their services and re-elected, with two changes. Representatives from the Manchester District S.S.A. and the North Midland S.S.A. were welcomed by the Rev. J. M. Bass and Mr. A. H. Webster. Miss Weeks responded for the North Midland Association and the Rev. John Ellis for the Manchester District. Both addresses were impressive and useful. Miss Weeks illustrated the power of sympathy to save and help in human life. Mr. Ellis urged the Yorkshire Union to affiliate to his Association. The speakers were heartily thanked for their addresses. After tea, a religious service was held in the fine old chapel, conducted by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, of Dublin. The whole service was uplifting and the sermon was heartening and challenging to all who heard it. The subject was 'Moral Cowardice,' based on Peter's denial. Mr. Hicks pointed out how the emphasis on the joy and freedom of religion had degenerated into slackness and cowardice on vital issues, in some cases. He uttered a call away from that. "Form your own view of existence carefully and honestly. Be sure of yourself and God. Have courage to defend your own ideals." There was a fair congregation.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

"A Garden of God."

The Secretary of State for India, in consultation with the War Office, has lately made arrangements to preserve the graves of Muslim soldiers who have died while under treatment in this country. A separate site has been acquired on Horsell Common, near the Woking mosque, and it has now been decided to enclose the seventeen graves already in existence, together with sufficient ground for future possible requirements, by a wall with a domed entrance gate and minarets at each of the four corners. Sir George Birdwood, writing appreciatively of this act of homage to the Indian dead (it is not necessary to have a cemetery for Hindus, as the Hindu custom of cremation has been followed), urges that this enclosure should be laid out as a "Garden of God," with cypresses, yews, cedars, pines, and firs planted therein, and that it should be surrounded by a cloister, arcaded on the inner side, and lighted on the outer side by windows of openworked tracery in stone. Such a garden, so built up and so planted, set beside the Mosque at Woking, would seem there, he says, "as if let down from heaven itself, and consecrate London a second Mecca in the devout regard and heart-felt affection of the Muslims throughout Europe and Western America." [Since writing the above we understand that Miss C. M. Faithfull, of Tunbridge Wells, has offered Sir George Birdwood her freehold family house and grounds, extending over four acres, at Walton-on-Thames, expressing her willingness to meet the cost of laying it out as a general Muslim burying-place.]

Social Problems in India.

An account in The Indian Messenger of the first Annual Meeting of the Bengal Social Service League, at which the chair was taken by the Bishop of Calcutta, reminds us that the social ideals for which the Brahmo Samaj has always fought are taking firm root. Such reforms as the improvement of the Depressed Classes, the education of women, and the abolition of the caste system, have now been taken up by the educated men of the Hindu community, and in respect of some questions the Government has been asked to adopt measures. The report of the Bengal Social Service League—which, it should be mentioned, is an absolutely non-sectarian institution—specially referred to the splendid work which had been done in connection with the famine in Bankura. Among the contributors to the Relief Fund were Sir S. P. Sinha, President, who was at the meeting, and Mrs. Annie Besant, whose gift of Rs. 1,000 was greatly appreciated. The Hon. Secretary is Dr. Maitra, to whom the warmest thanks were given for his services to the League.

Overworked Horses.

Many people have been grieved to notice of late the suffering caused to horses by the overloading of waggons and lorries. A correspondent in The Daily News draws attention to the matter, and points out that the standard of the lorry horse has been lowered by the demands of the war, and that with the shortage of labour and horses there is a tendency to make one waggon do the work of one and a half to cope with the work. The question of excessive fatigue has already been brought up in connection with munition and other workers, and it is very important that our responsibilities in regard to our dumb friends should be insisted upon with equal vigour, for they cannot speak for themselves. Apart from humane considerations, it does not "pay" to overtax the animals we press into our service. A horse is easily ruined by overstrain, and a good case can be made out on that ground for the economy of the light load.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THROUGH the kindness of one of our readers we have received this week a most encouraging message from a Belgian officer who is now in the Congo with the forces operating near Lake Kivu. A copy of THE INQUIRER was sent to him last autumn containing Prof. Gilbert Murray's address and Dr. Jacks' sermon at the National Conference. He now writes a letter of acknowledgment in which he says, "I have read your INQUIRER and it has interested me extremely. I have been able to see there how much the members of your liberal churches are interesting themselves in our Belgian hospitals, as well as in our soldiers who are convalescent or have been invalided out of the army, our refugees, &c." He asks his correspondent to accept the thanks which he sends from the very depths of his heart. These cordial and moving words are a further testimony to the strength of the ties of sympathy and mutual understanding which are being drawn closer together all over the the world by common sufferings and common efforts to bring help. It is no small satisfaction to be able to feel that our Belgian Hospital Fund is playing its part in this work, and indirectly is doing something to make the spirit of our churches felt as a friendly and healing influence in quarters where they were unknown before.

SIR EDWARD GREY is a master of concise and noble political statement, but he has almost excelled himself in the message which he has sent to The Chicago Daily News. It is true that it has all been said before, but it is necessary in the midst of a great conflict to confirm our own spirit and to stimulate the idealism of neutral countries by continual repetition of the chief articles of our faith. No man can be more inflexible than the man of peace when once he has been forced to draw the sword in a righteous cause.

> Prussian tyranny [he says] over Western Europe, including these islands, our people will not stand. The pledges given by Mr. Asquith as regards the restoration of Belgium and Serbia shall be kept. We have signed a pact to make peace only in concert with our Allies; this pact, I need not say, we shall honour, strictly, and to the end. What we and our Allies are fighting for is a free Europe. We want a Europe free, not only from the domination of one nationality by another, but from hectoring diplomacy and the peril of war, free from the constant rattling of the sword in the scabbard, from perpetual talk of shining armour and war lords. In fact we feel we are fighting for equal rights; for law, justice, peace; for civilisation throughout the world as against brute force, which knows no restraint and no mercy.

SIR EDWARD GREY proceeds to contrast our belief in peaceful methods of settling disputes between nations with Germany's idea of the wholesomeness of war and the philosophy which teaches that a settled peace spells disintegration, degeneracy, and the sacrifice of the heroic qualities in human character.

> We believe in negotiation. We have faith in international conferences. We proposed a conference before this war broke out. We urged Germany to agree to a conference. Germany declined to do so. Then I requested Germany to select some form of mediation, some method of peaceful settlement of her own. She would not come forward with any such suggestion. Then the Emperor of Russia proposed to Germany to send the dispute to The Hague Tribunal. There was no response. Our proposal of a conference was rejected by Germany; Russia, France, and Italy all accepted it. Our proposal that Germany should suggest some means of peaceful settlement met with no success, nor did the Tsar's proposal of arbitration. No impartial judgment of any kind was to be permitted to enter. It was a case of Europe submitting to the Teutonic will or going to war.

WE must find space for one more quotation from this remarkable message, for it states with uncompromising clearness the principle that peace is only to be desired when the ends of justice have been achieved.

> The injustice done by this war has got to be set right. The Allies can tolerate no peace that leaves the wrongs of this war unredressed. When persons come to me with pacific counsels I think they should tell me what sort of peace they have in mind. They should let me know on which side they stand; for the opponents do not agree. If they think, for example, that Belgium was innocent of offence, that she has been unspeakably wronged, that she should be set up again by those who tore her down, then it seems to me, they should say so. Peace counsels that are purely abstract and make no attempt to discriminate between the rights and the wrongs of this war are ineffective if not irrelevant....Nobody wants peace more than we want it. But we want a peace that does justice, and a peace that re-establishes respect for the public law of the world.

THERE is a certain amount of disappointment in the public mind because day after day there is no word of any definite result from the Prime Minister's visit to Ireland. He went suddenly at a most critical moment on a mission of hope and appeasement. Has he met with success? To this natural question there is at the moment no answer. But the silence, while it gives ground for hopeful speculation, emphasises the obligation which rests upon every citizen of the United Kingdom of preserving the kind of atmosphere both in the press and in public discussion in which better things can be born. We have all been sobered by what has happened, and people who are patriotic enough to desire a solution rather than a victory for their own side will avoid the old habits of vehement speech and partizan judgment, which have brooded like a curse over the Irish controversy hitherto. The Englishman, if he is wise, will do nothing to aggravate the situation with the customary appeals for strong government and coercion. And the Irishman, if he loves his country more than his own party, will deprecate all wild and passionate language, like that of Mr. Dillon in the House of Commons last week, which drives the lines of division deep down into the hearts of the people, and does some Irishmen the very ill service of making them think that crime is less criminal and dishonour more open to excuse in them than in other men.

A SHORT time ago we had regretfully to admit that no other course was open to our Government but to refuse the proposals of American relief for the starving people of Poland. Fortunately the negotiations have not been dropped, and the Foreign Office has just made the welcome announcement that it has now been able, with the consent of the Russian Government, to obtain safeguards against abuse from Germany which justify it in giving facilities for a limited scheme of relief. The work will be undertaken by the American Commission which has been responsible for the relief of Belgium. The scheme will apply to certain specified cities only, such as Warsaw and Lodz, the German Government undertaking to revictual the rest of the balance of the population in the occupied territory, and to turn over to the Commission sufficient German shipping to do the entire transportation of supplies from North America or other places to Danzig. It is proposed to provision the destitute without cost, but to sell the food to the well-to-do. The scheme will only be in operation until October 1, when the new harvest will suffice for the entire civilian population.

EARLY on Sunday morning we are to gain by stealth the boon of an hour more daylight. By the simple device of putting on the hands of our clocks we shall present ourselves with a large sum of money and increase our enjoyment of the beauty of the world. The wonder of summer dawns is lost for most of us because we are sunk in sleep. One hour earlier out of bed will not make us awake with nature, but it will bring us a step nearer to her simple ways and increase our health and joy. To many of us this is the "saving" which appeals to us most. It is a kind of economy which actually makes us richer than we were before.

BUT of course as sensible people we must remember that the object of a benevolent Government is not to turn us into happy sun-worshippers but to make us save money. Apparently Benjamin Franklin was one of the first to suggest daylight-saving, and we do not require his own assurance that he was attracted to it because it satisfied his love of economy. The Observer reprinted last Sunday the article which he wrote on the subject for the Paris Journal in 1784. With mock solemnity he announces the important discovery which he made one morning that the sun gives light as soon as it rises. "I am convinced of this. I am certain of my fact. One cannot be more certain of any fact. I saw it with my own eyes. And having repeated this observation the three following mornings I found always precisely the same result." He then proceeds to make an elaborate calculation of the amount which Paris would save in six months if it changed its habits and used the sunshine, which costs nothing, instead of candles. He concludes his whimsical argument with the following appeal to the Parisians:—"They are as well instructed, judicious, and prudent a people as exist anywhere in the world, all professing, like myself, to be lovers of economy; and from the many heavy taxes required from them by the necessities of the State, have surely an abundant reason to be economical." This was all 132 years ago, and at last the prim prophet of thrift has conquered.

ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE, whose death will cause widespread sorrow, was one of the most original figures in the Church of England. Perhaps his distinguished name made bishops tolerant of his nebulous theology and the liberties which he took with the stiff routine of the Prayer Book. In his early days he was a crusader for social reform and became a powerful temperate advocate. When he removed to Westminster and was appointed Chaplain to the House of Commons it was noticed that he withdrew from controversy and threw himself with ardour into the work of the pulpit. The gain to his religious influence was great. At the Abbey and in his own church of St. John, Westminster, he drew large congregations and revealed a remarkable power of keeping minds of a rather unconventional type in fellowship with the Church. In recent years he became an apostle of the doctrine of Immanence and seemed to find there the solution of all theological difficulties and the healing of all social ills. But he was not a great thinker, and this doctrine was simply a vehicle for the transmission of the mystery of his own personality. The secret of his power lay in the vitalising breadth of his sympathies and a spiritual sensitiveness, which seemed to radiate from his presence and was open to every appeal of sentient life.

IT will be seen from the report of its Annual Meeting in our present issue that the British Women's Temperance Association is of the same opinion still, and makes a virtue of the fact that it never changes its mind. Prohibition and nothing but prohibition is still its watchword, and it almost encourages the belief that it would rather see England drunk than help it to be sober on any other terms. If we are not greatly mistaken there is more practical conviction in all grades of society that the Drink Trade needs to be controlled and our national drink bill to be greatly reduced than has ever existed before, and there is a reasonable chance that temperance reform will be recognised as a matter of grave public concern by men of all parties after the war. It will be a terrible responsibility for temperance reformers to assume, if they adopt an uncompromising attitude in face of a new situation and refuse to co-operate with people who do not accept total prohibition as their own ideal or regard it as coming within the range of practical politics.

CASES OF CONSCIENCE.

Several weeks ago we expressed the opinion that the controversy about conscientious objectors to military service was likely to lead to some lowering of the reverence with which the word conscience is regarded by the public mind. Since then the controversy has become embittered, and there is grave danger that many people who read the newspapers but seldom think out problems for themselves will come to the conclusion that conscience is the badge of a small and fussy set of men who refuse to defend their country at a time of grave national danger. No one who has any respect for religion can view such a result without alarm, and we hope that some of the estimable men and women who have been most fervent in their appeals to conscience will recognise their own responsibility in the matter. It is, of course, very easy to throw the whole blame upon the Tribunals. They have not always shown the patience and the understanding which we expect in servants of the public. A curious document of cross questions and crooked answers might be compiled from the reports of their proceedings, but it would probably tell as heavily against the good sense of the applicants as against the good temper of the assessors, and in any case it would be quite useless for a proper understanding of the situation. The bluff sportsman who exclaims in a fit of irritation, "What do you want with a conscience?" is no more typical of the average member of a Tribunal than the man, who made the odious reply that he would not even assist a Red Cross nurse who was in difficulties with a wounded man, is a fair specimen of the conscientious objector.

The truth is that the Tribunals are composed for the most part of the men to whom our whole local life owes a boundless debt for their devotion to public duty and the diligence and fairness of mind with which it has been performed. They found themselves called upon suddenly to face a difficult and distasteful task, one moreover which required gifts of tactfulness and discrimination such as few of us possess. It is fair to ask whether the claimants who have appeared before them have taken enough trouble to be conciliatory and to prove their case, recognising that exemption for themselves is a tremendously serious thing to ask and ought to be an unusually difficult thing to obtain. And when this exemption is asked for in public in the name of conscience, has it been always present to their mind that they must show themselves unselfish, eager to bear public burdens, ready to face danger and privation, and not too obstinately wedded to their own opinions, if the name of conscience is not to be profaned? For every conscientious objector, who has thought this question out to the bottom, must be aware that he has the singularly difficult task of proving in this particular case that it is dutifulness and not the instincts of selfishness or fear which makes him refuse danger and accept the same path, though from very different motives, as the shirker and the coward. Conscience usually claims the post of sacrifice and suffering for its own, and thereby it proves its sincerity and shames the critic into silence. When its name is invoked in order to guard a man from a course of action involving terrible risks, which others accept with a cheerful courage, there is serious danger that it may fall in public esteem. We know of only one way in which this can be prevented. The man who refuses the duty must show by his actions that he is as capable of facing hardship and forgetting himself as the man who accepts it. If the conscientious objector had come forward with an alternative scheme for serving his country, involving sacrifice and risk for himself, we believe that he would have had very little trouble with the Tribunals. Whatever harshness there has been has sprung not from a love of petty persecution but from a feeling, which is in itself honourable and right, that conscience must not be turned into an easy way of doing nothing.

But it may be said that all this is beside the mark, for the decisions of conscience and the duties it imposes are matters between ourselves and God alone. This theory of conscience as a mystical personal dogma, which if it does not dethrone intelligence renders its use unnecessary, is held by many people, but it will not bear examination unless we are prepared to approve courses of conduct which are mutually destructive and to deny the possibility of a moral foundation for society. Indeed nothing has become clearer in some recent discussions than the crying need of the clear light of intelligence upon some passionate individual conclusions. For any man to say that he would rather place his whole country and the spiritual treasures of a great civilisation in jeopardy than admit the probability of error in his own conscience betrays, no doubt, a superb indifference to the consequences of moral action, but it is not reasonable or good in any accepted meaning of these terms. A notable contribution to this more intelligent use of conscience has been made by Canon Rashdall in an article on 'The Ethics of Conscientious Objection' in the current number of The Modern Churchman. We commend it to the attention of our readers as one of the most suggestive and valuable aids to the rational discussion of the problem which has appeared. Here we can only refer to two passages which are a strong reinforcement of the position which we have supported in these columns. The first deals specifically with the plea that we offend against the first principles of religious liberty when we refuse, under certain circumstances, to grant a man complete freedom to follow the dictates of his own conscience regardless of the effect of his actions upon the safety and welfare of his fellow-citizens.

> Some people [Canon Rashdall writes] think that the State has no right to make a man do anything which he has a conscientious objection to doing. They talk about the Military Service Act amounting to a revival of religious persecution and the like. They do not seem to see that religious toleration means merely the right to hold and express religious opinions, and to practise religious worship—not to do everything that any religion prescribes or approves. Even to the free expression of opinions limits are set by the imperative requirements of social well-being; many of the very people who use such language would often be among the first to advocate the suppression of immoral literature, though, undoubtedly, there are many who conscientiously believe in the views of life which such literature propagates. Still less can the State tolerate the open advocacy of sedition. As to the claim for toleration on the part of every one who acts upon the dictates of his own particular religion, no State could prosper or even exist which did not punish many kinds of conduct which are quite in accordance with some consciences and some religions.

The other passage is one which we may quote practically without comment. It is plain, direct, and forceful, and its conclusions will be unpleasant to some sensitive ears, but we are unable to see how they can be resisted without drifting into dangerous moral anarchy.

Ought we then [he asks] to refuse to recognise conscientious objections at all? I do not think so. The principle of loyalty to Conscience is so important that it is desirable for a State, so far as it can safely do so, to offer those who have a conscientious objection to fighting some alternative form of national service. They are often men of high character, to whom the State should be as gentle as national safety will allow. Moreover, a man who is really prepared to be shot rather than to shoot will not be useful as a soldier. As to the objectors to non-combatant service, it is impossible to deny that they often have logic on their side: absurd premises lead on to still more absurd conclusions. But the common sense of the matter is that it is so easy to affect a conscientious objection which is really due to mere cowardice or laziness or selfishness that the State simply cannot discriminate between really conscientious and wholly or partially unconscientious objections, and must so deal with all objectors as to prevent their number multiplying. A man who finds it inconsistent with his conscience to dig a trench when the State holds that a trench should be digged is unfit for social life. He has declared war against society, and society must fight him. If for obvious practical reasons the State abstains from shooting him, it must at least do what it can to prevent the spread of such anti-social conduct.

We hardly expect that this appeal to the common sense of the matter will make much impression upon those who rely upon the naked dogmas of their own conscience and scorn the practical compromises of intelligence. If there are any such among our readers we venture to commend to their attention the following pertinent dictum in a recent essay by Dr. Jacks:—"I question if any man requires so much intelligence as does the man who turns his back upon intelligence and elects to live by something else."

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

WHEN the dumb Hour, clothed in black,
Brings the Dreams about my bed,
Call me not so often back,
Silent Voices of the dead,
Toward the lowland ways behind me,
And the sunlight that is gone!
Call me rather, silent voices,
Forward to the starry track
Glimmering up the heights beyond me
On, and always on! TENNYSON.

NOW once again by all concurrence of signs and by the general instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in His Church, even to the reforming of Reformation itself. What does He then but reveal Himself to His servants, and as His manner is, first to His Englishmen; I say, as His manner is, first to us, though we mark not the methods of His counsels, and are unworthy?

Behold now this vast city; a city of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with His protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguered Truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching Reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a Nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil, but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a Nation of Prophets, of Sages, and of Worthies?

MAY the Almighty God order your days in His peace, and grant you the gifts of His blessing.

May he deliver you from all disturbance; and confirm your minds in the tranquility of His peace.

That, being adorned with the jewels of faith and hope and charity, ye may both pass unharmed through the present life, and safely reach the life eternal. Amen.

SICK SOLDIERS IN SWITZERLAND.

(From a Correspondent.)

AFTER much negotiating among the French, Swiss, and German Governments an agreement was finally decided upon with regard to interning sick French and German prisoners in Switzerland. The first convoys have already arrived there at different centres, and consisted of those suffering from tuberculosis. The Germans, about one hundred men with four officers, reached Davos one afternoon, to be welcomed by the German Consul and a huge crowd of sympathisers from among the large German colony there.

The French convoy of one hundred and seventeen men and one officer arrived at Leysin just as the sun in all its glory was rising in an azure sky over the snow-clad mountains. Enthusiastic peasants had come in from the surrounding country for miles around to welcome the brave polius. Standing on the railway platform (forbidden to the vulgar herd) were the Syndic, various orators and big-wigs, such as municipal councillors, doctors, deputations from clubs with their flags, "sapeurs," and "pompiers." Of course, the local band. This last played with much fervour what the English spectators fondly imagined to be 'God Save the King,' and greatly were they flattered till they realised that this is also a Swiss National Anthem. Then came shouts of "Vive la France!" "Vive la Suisse!" the singing of the 'Marseillaise,' fraternising with the people, deluges of gifts, much speechifying. Again the band, again cheering, and then the men, bedecked with flowers and encumbered with their presents, were marched off in two detachments to the hotels "Dents du Midi" and "d'Aurore." At Leysin the prisoners will enjoy a relative amount of liberty, much as if they were on parole. The arrangement is that in case of attempted escape the prisoner, when recaptured, will be sent back to his original French or German detention camp.

It does your heart good to see these poor fellows enjoying themselves, sometimes, indeed, contrary to the doctor's orders, "making le sport" on toboggans. If you pay a visit (when you have succeeded in obtaining the necessary permission) to the Hotel d'Aurore at 4 o'clock, you find the men drinking their milk after the two hours "cure de silence." There they are, clad in all kinds of uniforms, for many regiments are represented: line regiments, cavalry, Zouaves, chasseurs d'Afrique, and a Turco. They are seated in a fine, cheerful, airy hall, with a portrait of "le Père Joffre," flanked on each side by pictures from L'Illustration, adorning the walls.

In spite of their terrible hardships, now happily over, the poilus are most of them as merry as possible. Some of these unfortunate fellows have been prisoners for sixteen and seventeen months, having been wounded at Charleroi and Maubeuge. They show melancholy traces of what they have endured. Quite young men's hair has turned grey. One poor fellow is inconsolable: he has lost his father and a brother in the war, his sister was killed, his mother has just died of grief, another brother is a prisoner. He wonders if it is worth while struggling to get well with all he cared for gone. There are not many confined to bed, and only one is seriously ill with fever. But even the "bedders" are happy, and all are delighted with their beautiful clean rooms and white beds.

They tell you they were quite overcome by their reception in Switzerland. All the way from Constance to Lausanne and Leysin it was a crescendo of welcome. Showers of flowers and presents rained on them to such an extent that they had no room on the seats of the carriages for themselves. On their arrival at "Aurore" they packed up a good part of the gifts and dispatched them to their less fortunate comrades left behind in Germany. The prisoners have two hours liberty each day, and are supposed to go for limited walks—doctors' orders!

A second convoy of one hundred and twenty-five prisoners, including a few officers, has since arrived. In the course of his speech welcoming them, M. Risler, Hon. President of the Société Française, called attention to all that Switzerland had done for them, and asked what they would have done without the Swiss bread. Without a moment's hesitation came the unanimous reply, "Nous serions morts!" These men averred that the English prisoners were treated worse than the French. One touching little incident occurred quite recently. A French lady staying at Leysin, who had not had news of her son for months and had given him up as dead, discovered him among a newly arrived batch of prisoners. Since then many more tubercular prisoners have arrived at Leysin, and French and German soldiers suffering from various diseases have been distributed throughout Switzerland.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE BOOK OF ITALY.

THE BOOK OF ITALY. London, T. Fisher Unwin, 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

WHEN the war is over, if it is given to some of us to look back through a long retrospect of years, we shall be able to recover some of the exalted emotions of the present moment, the feeling of growing fraternity among the nations, the sense of dedication to a cause, through these books which have been published for the help of the wounded. 'The Book of France,' 'The Book of Belgium,' and now 'The Book of Italy,' have all had a twofold object in view. Writers and artists have co-operated in an act of interpretation and of homage, and at the same time they have offered us a beautiful thing as a possession in exchange for a trifling gift of help to the men stricken in the field. This 'Book of Italy' is issued in aid of the Italian Soldiers' and Sailors' Families in the United Kingdom and of the Italian Red Cross, and has been planned so as to include the work of as many writers and artists as possible. No one will want to sit down and read it straight through, but it is a charming companion for odd moments of leisure. These sketches, with their attendant pictures, will recall Italian hours, which for many Englishmen have been memorable for their spiritual influence, both in kindling reverence for the past and in enlarging the passion of freedom. Apart from the official messages from Mr. Asquith, Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, and Signor Salandra, and the introduction by Viscount Bryce, we may select for praise the articles by Mr. Frederic Harrison, Mr. Clutton-Brock, M. Paul Sabatier, Prof. Gilbert Murray, Mr. John Galsworthy, Mr. Edmund Gardner, and Dr. P. H. Wicksteed. The only specially notable name we miss from the list is that of Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, without which any 'Book of Italy' issued in this country must appear strangely incomplete. Dr. Wicksteed describes his first visit to Florence twenty years ago, and how he and his wife approached it on foot by the old mountain road from Bologna, "because I had a fancy that my first sight of Florence should be from the Uccellatoio, whence Dante tells us that in his day the splendour of 'the great city on the fair stream,' first breaking upon the astonished gaze of the traveller, outvied the glories of Rome as seen from Monte Mario." Prof. Gilbert Murray, striking a different note, recalls his friendshp with an old Italian painter, a Roman Republican, who had fought for Italian Unity, and having seen it accomplished was dissatisfied. "We suffered under the Austrians and the Bourbons," he would say, "we suffered in the long struggle for our freedom. But it was not enough to purify us. We are a materialist nation, like all the others! ....Taxes, earthquakes, poverty, quarrelling among ourselves—all that is no good. We need more suffering of the old Risorgimento sort, suffering for a cause, where each man works and dies not for himself, but for Italy and Humanity." Prof. Murray reflects how the severe old face would have lit up if he could have lived to see the doings of 1915, when Italy decided for the road of sacrifice which is also the road of honour. "It is not merely one nation against another," so he writes, "it is one religion against another....For Italy there was only one road, and that a hard and uphill road, if she was to be her true self, the Italy of Garibaldi and Mazzini and Victor Emmanuel, of Dante and Virgil; the MAGNA PARENS VIRUM; the torchbearer of nations, who awakened the modern world from its slumber and keeps alive the great beacon of republican Rome. It is the road of sacrifice and of freedom; may it be also the road of victory!"

GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE.

GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE IN FRANCE, ENGLAND, AND ITALY. By T. G. Jackson. Cambridge, at the University Press, 2 vols., £2 12*s.* 6*d.* net.

THESE two beautiful volumes are a worthy sequel to Sir Thomas Jackson's earlier work on 'Byzantine and Romanesque Architecture.' There is the same breadth of view, the same charm of style, the same sensitive feeling for the connection between the builder's art and the development of national character, and a similar wealth of beautiful illustrations. It would be doing them less than justice if we were to describe them as architecture for amateurs; but it is no small part of their signal merit that they can be read with pleasure by educated people, whose interest in buildings is human rather than technical. A great church like Winchester, Westminster Abbey, Chartres, or Reims, provides endless problems for the specialist; but it in no sense belongs to him. It is set there for the joy of the people, and as the expression of the common needs and instincts of worship. Until it is entirely destroyed it must stand where its builders placed it, keeping guard over the city and itself a part of the city's life. For this reason architecture is the most democratic of the arts. No ingenuity can divert it from public to private uses and make it minister only to the pleasure of the wealthy connoisseur or the professional student.

Recent events have given a special interest to the pages in which Sir T. Jackson discusses the characteristics of French Gothic. Though we think his chief affection is given to Chartres he writes with hardly less enthusiasm about Reims, which "brought the model of a French cathedral to perfection." The problems of construction and the skill with which they have been solved are not emphasised at Reims as they are at Amiens and Beauvais, and there is in consequence a feeling of greater strength and repose about the whole building. It was these qualities which enabled it to bear its extraordinary wealth of ornament without any feeling of restlessness or affectation. Devotion to these French churches does not, however, blind our author to the peculiar excellences of the English style, which, generally speaking, has not shown the same fondness for logical extremes. In an exceedingly interesting chapter in which he develops this contrast, and traces it back to differences of national character, he writes as follows :—

"In buildings where everything depends on the equilibrium of forces, where thrust must balance thrust and nothing is in repose, where no margin is left for safety and every part depends upon the rest standing firm, so that if one gave way the rest would follow, one doubts whether the result is worth the risk, and whether too much has not been sacrificed to engineering ingenuity. Experience justifies this doubt. Amiens, where the theory of stability by equilibrium of forces finds the fullest expression, has had to be held together by iron cramps all along the gallery....Other instances are numerous. Fortunately, France is not subject to earthquakes, or I imagine a much milder shock than any that have failed to bring down S. Sophia, shaken and decrepit though it be, would lay any one of the French cathedrals later than that of Reims level with the ground. Logic is not everything, and in England it is not our way to hunt our conclusions to death. Our buildings do not drive things so fine, but leave something over and above the least that would do. And in France I confess I often turn from the fine-spun edifices of the end of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries to the more generous, if less scientific solidity of the preceding period."

Sir T. Jackson is not a sentimentalist about mediæval builders and craftsmen. He sees no reason to suppose that they were very different from those of the present day, allowing for difference of education and knowledge, and he has had a good deal of personal experience of mediæval scamping, especially in the matter of foundations and the use of bad mortar. He agrees with the statement of Viollet-le-Duc that, generally speaking, the execution of Gothic work is far inferior to that of the Romanesque builders. Nevertheless he holds that the men of the Middle Ages had what we have in a great measure lost, "a lively and free artistic temperament, which made it natural and easy for them to do things beautifully, because they did them unconsciously." Our difficulty is that we are hampered by our scholarship and our absorption in the doings of the past to such an extent that we can seldom do anything but copy, and the copyist, however accurate he may be, has lost the instinct for creation. Sir T. Jackson sees that architecture cannot be a living art in the modern world until we have solved the problem of learning from the past and still not being bound by it. "So long," he says, "as our work is consciously imitated from what was done in other days and under other conditions so long will it be unreal. The only modern work that will have any interest for our children will be such as has come naturally and unconsciously to the artist to meet the occasion. Unfortunately there is little of it." We are tempted to apply this comment specially to the building and adornment of churches in our own country, and to add this further remark that our architecture is lacking in power and originality because religion itself is so imitative. That is the cardinal error of modern ritualistic movements. They furnish us with pretty copies of mediæval devotions, but they have no power to originate anything, for the souls of men have ceased to live naturally among the thoughts and ideals of the Middle Ages, and they will never do so again to the end of time. Any forcible attempt to return to the past along lines of strict imitation, instead of quietly laying up its wisdom in our hearts, impoverishes the life of art because first of all it cripples the life of the soul.

The European Anarchy. By G. Lowes Dickinson. London, George Allen & Unwin, Ltd., 2*s*. 6*d*. net.

The fulfilment of this book is not as good as its promise. The author sets out to give us an impartial study of the underlying causes of the war, and he sets down his notes and speculations "in the hope that they may offer a counterpoise to some of the wilder passions that sweep over all peoples in time of war and threaten to prepare for Europe a future even worse than its past has been." Unfortunately the reader soon discovers that impartiality of this kind does not exclude strong prepossessions, which determine both the selection and the arrangement of the material and the judgment which is passed upon it. It seems to be an axiom for Mr. Lowes Dickinson's political conscience that both parties to a war are almost equally criminal. It is a case of two scoundrels falling out by the way, and the only difference between them is in the degree of their baseness. Now we, on our side, hold this to be radically false both in history and in morals. In the present case it leads Mr. Dickinson, though he admits that the chief guilt for the final catastrophe lies with Germany, to do everything he can to exhibit the German people as harmless and peace-loving up to the outbreak of the war, and ourselves and our allies as at least provocative and unpleasant. For him the responsibility for the war "is embedded in and conditioned by a responsibility deeper and more general—the responsibility of all the Powers alike for the European anarchy." Such a statement can only be made to appear plausible when we dismiss from our minds the existence of world-wide German intrigues against the safety and welfare of other states, and exclude aggressive wars of the Napoleonic type as unthinkable in the modern world. Mr. Dickinson's short sketch of a possible settlement does not carry us very far. It is on the lines of an international court of arbitration backed by force. But what are we to think of the political insight which puts the probable refusal of the Allies to hand back her colonies to Germany on the same level as Germany's claim to annex Belgium? The German colonies have been used as a menace to the liberties of other people; they were links in a scheme of conquest; and the least we can do, when we have the power, is to exact stringent guarantees against further criminal attempts of a similar kind. We are even prepared to argue that it would be contrary to public virtue to do anything else.

BRITISH WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Fortieth Annual Public Meeting of the British Women's Temperance Association was held at Kingsway Hall on Tuesday evening, May 16, Mrs. Randolph Clarkson in the chair. There was a large audience, and the speakers, who one and all reiterated the determination of the Association to keep the ideal of prohibition unswervingly before them in their various activities, elicited considerable applause. Mrs. Randolph Clarkson reviewed briefly the work of the past year, which had been, she said, one of the busiest they had ever known, and pointed out that at the present time they were reaping some reward for their long march through the wilderness during the forty years that had elapsed since their Association was formed, owing to the change that had come over public opinion in regard to temperance as a result of the war. Many ideas which they had long advocated, but which had once been received with derision and contempt, were now generally accepted, while prohibition had been adopted by tens of thousands of people in the United States and other countries. They welcomed every measure of temperance legislation if it represented a step in the right direction, but all attempts to introduce into this country the nationalisation of the drink traffic they would vehemently and strenuously oppose. It was inconceivable that what had proved to be their worst enemy should be given the prestige of State recognition and the rank of a Government Department. There were two great dangers which they had to face at the present time and ought to do all in their power to mitigate—the danger to our young men, now being called upon in such great numbers to meet many temptations in a new environment against which they ought to be protected; and the danger arising from the fact that women, including girls in their teens, were now taking the place of men, and spending long days, with alternating night-shifts, in monotonous, laborious toil which lowered the vitality, and made them less able to resist the temptation of drink. England must safeguard the young men and women against these evils, for upon them depended the future of our race.

Canon Masterman moved the following resolution:—"That this Annual Public Meeting of the National British Women's Temperance Association recognises the beneficial results of the restrictive orders imposed by the Central Control Board (Liquor Traffic), but declares its continued opposition to any scheme of Nationalisation of the Drink Traffic, and holds firmly to the conviction, greatly strengthened by recent experience in other countries, that the only real and complete remedy for the tragedy and waste caused by drink is to be found in prohibition." In expressing their gratitude for the work that the Liquor Board had done, he said, they must remember that it did not represent the solution proposed by the temperance people of this country. Their programme was something entirely different, and he believed that it had a good chance of acceptance about a year ago, when the people were in a mood to make greater sacrifices than they had ever done before. The Board had, however, done a very useful piece of work, and it owed a good deal, as it would be the first to admit, to organisations like theirs and the United Kingdom Alliance, from which it had been able to obtain reliable information upon which to base its policy. But the non-temperance person was apt to remind them that, although the Liquor Board had imposed all sorts of restrictions upon the country, the amount of drunkenness had not greatly decreased, and this, he thought, was the strongest argument for what they had always regarded as the only effective way of dealing with drunkenness, namely, prohibition. It rested upon them as citizens to see that whatever good had been obtained was not lost after the war. The demand for national efficiency was going to be more and more emphasised in the future, and slackness and incapacity would be penalised as they had never been in pre-war days. Canon Masterman emphatically repudiated the whole idea of the nationalisation of the drink traffic, which was regarded by many temperance reformers, whom he must call "misguided brethren," as a means to the end they were working for. These people were tempted with the idea that it was a short cut, and had forgotten that short cuts never work. They believed that if the State bought out the drink traffic and took it under its own control it would be much easier to get prohibition; but was it at all likely that they were going to persuade the British nation to put down something like three hundred millions for a trade which was about to be abolished? If the State took over the drink traffic it labelled it as a right and legitimate trade, the argument for prohibition was done away with, and any attempt to get rid of what the nation had just acquired would be met with tremendous forces of opposition. He would point out that Russia had been very nearly ruined by the nationalisation of the drink traffic, and it was only the dire and terrible necessity of the war that gave the Tsar courage to issue his edict. This question of nationalisation had had one disastrous result, it had divided the forces of temperance, and given the politicians a chance of postponing action till they, the temperance people, had come to some agreement as to what they really wanted. Putting the matter on its lowest ground—though he always wanted to ask, when people said that to him, "Why do you assume that you must put it on its lowest ground with me?"—the proposition was economically unsound, for it meant paying a large price for a declining trade which they meant to destroy as soon as possible. In conclusion, Canon Masterman said that if they allowed themselves to be drawn aside from the ideal of prohibition they would be sacrificing that claim to consistency which he believed was the source of their strength. There was really adequate ground for encouragement, and there was no need for them to put on the lugubrious appearance characteristic, according to the popular press, of the teetotal reformer. The temperance outlook had changed in many important ways. In the first place the war had made all kinds of people realise that things cannot be allowed to go on as they have done hitherto; and in the second place the spirit of sacrifice has begun to awaken in our national life. He hoped that, when peace crowned our present efforts, the country would resolve that it would have no more truck with the enemy within, but that, with God's will, we would go forward as a sober nation to face the problems of the future.

Miss Agnes Slack seconded the resolution, and made a strong appeal on behalf of the soldiers of the nation and the homes they left behind, under our protection, when they went to the front. A great many more lives were lost as a result of drink, including thousands of infants under twelve months, than on the battlefield. The nationalisation of the liquor traffic she regarded as indefensible. What was bad for the individual could not be good for the State, and in every country where it had been tried the scheme had defeated its ends.

Mr. Munro, K.C., M.P., the Lord Advocate for Scotland, said that, since the war broke out, many controversies had been rightly hushed, and many political schemes laid aside; but some problems in which we had formerly been merely interested had now become very insistent, and instead of inviting, compelled attention. To that class of problems the question of temperance belonged. It was evident that if they were to beat their present foes they must have efficient men, and that the output of the factories should not be lessened by the loss of time or energy which drinking habits involved. That meant that drink, the enemy in their midst, must not only be shunned, but killed. It had been his duty for ten years to be associated with the criminal law in Scotland, and his experience in that capacity corresponded with that of any one who has had to do the same kind of work, namely, that a large proportion of crime, and the worst forms of crime, are due to strong drink. We have always known this more or less, but it has been more clearly understood lately. Twenty months of war had taught the people of this country more effectively than twenty years of argument ever did or would do. We have come to realise the priceless value of sobriety, not only on the part of the soldier, but of the worker, and if the evil of intemperance was to be combated it must be combated here and now. We must see that we do not forget the lessons of the war in times of peace, and work hard for our cause, not relying too much on the negative virtues. A Frenchman who, on being told that a man wearing a blue ribbon did so to show that he did not drink, said, "If I wore a ribbon for every vice that I do not practise you would not see my coat." Mere abstinence was not enough, they must strive to form public opinion, for Boards and Governments would not act unless that was behind them. They must adopt every method in their power to persuade men and women of the truth of their doctrines, remembering that the whole foundation of our system, municipal and Imperial, is the persuasion of our fellowmen.

The Rev. J. H. Bateson (Wesleyan Army and Navy Board) aroused great interest by the human and sympathetic way in which he pleaded that criticism should not be too severe in regard to soldiers who give way to intemperance. He gave some instances showing not only how character can be ruined by drink, but how it can be redeemed again if the right appeal is made; and urged that no one should sit in judgment on the man in khaki until they had themselves done all in their power to protect him and support him in the awful struggle with temptation which was so much worse than the actual fighting. The conquests which had been made in this direction by men cut off from their moorings, and thrown into a new and dangerous environment, were truly heroic; but our experiences during the war had brought home to us this fact, that you must supply counter-attractions if you want to keep men sober. Legislation was not enough, the individual must be changed, and every chance given to him to withstand the evil that menaces his moral well-being.

MEN AND MOVEMENTS.

DR. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C. chose a very timely subject—'British Subjects and Aliens'—for his lectures as Gresham Professor of Law, which were delivered this week at Gresham College.

THE REV. T. P. SPEDDING is away on another long tour among the Camps. On his return we hope to have a further instalment of 'Camp Notes' from his pen. The work has special difficulties of its own, not the least being the frequency of the removals. No sooner has a group been formed for fellowship and worship in one centre than it is scattered by an order to move on.

A CONFIRMATION SERVICE was held recently at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, at which young people belonging to three different congregations were welcomed into fellowship. A service of this kind might well be held annually in London and other large centres of population. It would require close cooperation among ministers and congregations for a common aim, but this would be a great advantage, for it would help to break down the paralysing individualism of many Nonconformist congregations, the members of which are only interested in their own minister and their own services. For the smaller congregations there would be great advantages in a scheme of this kind, as they seldom have enough young people who are just at the right stage for a service of welcome and dedication at the same time.

WE understand that a formal presentation of the gift of the Sunday Schools for the Belgian Hut will be made at the annual meeting of the Sunday School Association on Whit-Tuesday. Mrs. Bernard Allen and the Rev. W. H. Drummond will receive and acknowledge the gift on behalf of the Belgian Hospital Fund.

WE have received the May number of The Free Catholic, edited by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. It contains articles by the Editor on 'The Key of Knowledge'; 'Science in a Progressive Catholicism,' by Mr. Malcolm Quin; and 'Evangelical Poverty,' by Canon Adderley, and two of a more meditative type on 'Christian Experience' and 'The Practice of Prayer,' by the Rev. W. Whitaker and the Rev. J. S. Burgess respectively.

THE following passage from a letter from a friend in Canada will be of interest to our readers:—"Conditions here are so difficult to see broadly from the inside and the matters are so trivial and remote beside the tremendous issues at stake in Europe. We are fighting graft in all sorts of ways, and have also just been carrying local Prohibition and Equal Suffrage in Manitoba, and quite a few social reforms such as Widows' Pensions and Prison Reform. Of course, there is active recruiting, which has met with good results, and much Red Cross and Belgian and other relief work, but we are at such a distance that it has not the same overwhelming preponderance in our life that it must have with you."

WE owe Dr. A. D. Tyssen a sincere apology for our delay in calling attention to his book on 'The Church Bells of Sussex' (Lewis, Farncome & Co.). It made its first appearance fifty years ago, and was then the first complete county bell history to be published. Its reappearance in a revised and enlarged form is a remarkable instance of life-long devotion to a delightful archæological hobby. Dr. Tyssen has most generously placed six copies of his book at our disposal for the benefit of our Belgian Hospital Fund. The price is 5*s*. net, postage 4*d*. Orders and remittance should be sent to the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

THE COMMITTEE OF THE WOMEN'S LEAGUE recommends to the attention of its members the request for help in money or goods from the Blackpool (South Shore) Branch, for their Sale of Work on May 24. Contributions will be gratefully received by Mrs. Constable, 3 Green Avenue, Highfield Road, Blackpool S.S.; or by Mrs. Atkinson, 122 Harrow Side, Blackpool S.S. The Pontypridd Branch are holding a Sale of Work on June 15, and would be very glad of help from other Branches and members. Contributions, whether in money or goods, may be sent to Mrs. Lewis, Tophill, Pontypridd.

IT is intended to publish a volume of letters written by the late Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. His executors and family would be very grateful to any of his correspondents who will lend for this purpose any letters which may be of general interest. The letters will be returned to the senders as soon as done with. Address, Miss Evelyn Brooke, The Four Winds, Ewhurst, Surrey.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belper.—On the Sunday after Easter the Belper Home Guards held a church parade at the Unitarian Chapel in this town. The Rev. A. Leslie Smith, as N.C.C., marched with them to the chapel and afterwards again to headquarters. It was stirring to hear the men sing the well-chosen hymns, beginning with "Thou Lord of Hosts, whose guiding hand." The sermon was on "England's Best Armour," and from Ephesians vi. 10-12, and the legend of St. George. The preacher went on to describe England as a champion of right, and the spiritual forces which are the true strength of the British Empire. Many of the men have expressed their pleasure in the service. On May 14 the Sunday School Anniversary Services were conducted, in the morning by the Minister, in the evening by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield.

Blackley.—The Chapel Anniversary Services were held on Sunday, May 14, when the Rev. E. D. Priestly Evans, of Bury, was the preacher.

Bridgwater.—At a well-attended Annual Meeting of the congregation of Christ Church held on Sunday evening, May 7, the following resolution was moved by the minister, who presided, seconded by Mr. Alexander, and carried unanimously: "That Christ Church, Bridgwater, assembled for its annual meeting, desires to send hearty greetings to the First Church, Unitarian, Bridgwater, Massachusetts, and to congratulate that church on the celebration, this year, of its two hundredth anniversary."

Bristol.—The ninety-fourth anniversary services were held in connection with the united schools of Lewin's Mead Chapel on Sunday, May 14, when special addresses were given by the minister, Dr. Tudor Jones. Among the hymns which were sung by about four hundred scholars were two by the late minister, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the tunes of which have been composed by Mr. David Churchill, master of the Stokes Croft School, who acted as teacher and conductor. A special service for young people had been held on the previous Sunday.

London Sunday School Society.—The Annual Choral Competition and Musical Festival of this Society was held on Saturday, May 13, at Essex Hall. Owing to the uncertainty surrounding evening meetings for children, the usual evening concert was abandoned, and the proceedings were confined to an afternoon contest among the competing choirs. The adjudicator was Miss Amy C. Wood, whose impartial awards and valuable criticisms justified the Society's action in appointing a lady judge for the first time. The precedent is one to be followed. The competition was divided into two parts—the junior section competing for a shield, and the senior section for the Society's banner. At 3.15 the Rev. A. H. Biggs, M.A. (President), opened the competition by announcing that there had been only two junior entries this year, viz.: Unity Church, Islington, led by Miss Longhurst, and Bell Street Choir conducted by Miss Harris. The latter choir was the holder of the shield. The two choirs each sang a test piece, "The Voice of the Grass," followed by their own selected pieces, that of Unity being Pinsuti's "When Life is Brightest," while Bell Street chose Foster's "The Harvest Dance." The singing in each case was excellent. In the senior section there were four competitors: Highgate (Conductor, Miss V. Withall); Ilford (Conductor, Miss D. Sayers); Newington Green (Conductor, Mrs. R. H. Smith); and Dingley Place (Conductor, Miss V. Withall). The test piece was "Sleep, Gentle Lady," and the selected pieces for the four choirs respectively were Cowen's "Cleansing Fires"; Ramsey's "I heard a Brooklet gushing"; Elgar's "The Dance"; and Coleridge-Taylor's "Viking Song"; all the choirs sang with remarkable accuracy, tone and spirit. After a short address by Mr. Ion Pritchard, tea was provided for the choirs, under the able management of Miss E. Titford. At 5.30, Miss Wood, in a speech which showed how keenly she had entered into the contest and how carefully and accurately she had made up her mind, gave her judgment. The Shield was awarded to Bell Street; while the Banner went to Dingley Place, the second position being given to Highgate. These two senior choirs were both led by Miss V. Withall, who received many congratulations on her double distinction, shared by Bell Street, which won the Junior Competition for the second consecutive year. The meeting closed with a hymn and benediction—Mr. Quarnby presiding at the organ. An announcement will appear shortly in this paper of the Aggregate Service for teachers and elder scholars, to be held at Essex Hall on Sunday, June 18. Mr. Pritchard, whose name is so long and honourably associated with our schools, is to conduct the service. Boys' and Girls' Brigades, Scouts and Guides, &c., are invited to attend in uniform. The service is at 3.15.

Peckham.—A Social meeting was held in the Schoolroom, Avondale Road, on Wednesday, the 10th inst., to welcome the Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A., the newly appointed minister. In the course of the evening Mr. Herford spoke a few words, in which, after referring to his previous lengthy ministry in the north of England, he expressed his great pleasure at finding himself again in a position to minister to the needs of a congregation; and earnestly appealed for the friendship and support of all those connected with the church in the new chapter about to be commenced. Replies on behalf of the congregation were made by Mr. W. J. Cooley, Hon. Sec. and Mr. G. W. Gibberd. The Rev. Geo. Carter also spoke a few words of encouragement to both minister and congregation.

South Cheshire.—The twenty-sixth Annual Meeting of the South Cheshire and District Association was held at Nantwich on Wednesday, May 10. Mr. R. Mansell, President, occupied the chair. The Annual Reports and the Financial Statement were received and adopted, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, the Rev. J. Park Davies; Treasurer, Mr. D. W. Ross; Secretary, the Rev. G. Pegler; Executive Committee, Mr. R. Mansell, Mr. E. S. Jackson, the Rev. D. J. Evans; Auditor, Mr. J. Johnston; Visitors, Mrs. Myers, Mrs. Ross, Miss Edith Gittins. At the conference the Rev. D. J. Evans spoke on 'The Need of Organisation in the Unitarian Churches.' He said there was no organisation in the Unitarian body whose business it was to see that none of our congregations went out of existence. The District Associations were limited in their sphere of work. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the National Conference represented the whole denomination and did splendid work, but what will they do to keep struggling causes alive? A new organisation, something like the Primitive Methodist Synod, was needed to take hold of our churches and not to allow any to die of want. Mr. D. W. Ross, the Rev. W. Griffiths, Mr. Pace, the Rev. W. Agar, Mr. J. Watson, the Rev. J. Park Davies, Mr. A. Hulme, the Rev. G. Pegler, and the President, took part in the discussion. At the evening service the Rev. J. Cyril Flower of Bolton preached a sermon on 'The Quest of the Holy City.' Mr. Flower said that the unrestful mass of men knew not where to turn for salvation. They sought to find it in pilgrimages. Some devoted themselves to ritual and tradition, others tried to find the Holy City by forgetting their bodies and by surrendering themselves wholly to God. Citizenship was not to be won by pilgrimage, and the mistake of pilgrimage to the relics of the dead was no worse than the pilgrimage to the shrines of dead ideas. Sanctity resided only in character, as John Masefield's Capt. Margaret discovered, and as the prophets taught. We needed infinite patience, faith, endurance, preparation. Great things could not be done in a moment. Only piece by piece, brick by brick, heart by heart, could men be won.

Western Union.—The Annual Assembly of the Western Union was held at Taunton on May 9. The proceedings were confined this year to the business meeting, the President being in the chair. Mr. E. J. Blake, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion and the Rev. Rudolf Davis were re-elected President, Treasurer and Secretary respectively. The Committee was also re-elected. Grants were made to the aided churches on the same scale as last year, and special war grants were voted to the ministers of eight congregations. The committee's report stated that the withdrawal of officers of congregations, Sunday school teachers and others, for military or other service had in several cases caused difficulty in carrying on congregational activities; about £40 was still needed at Crediton to repair the damage done by dry-rot; and the larger loss on The Western Union Chronicle, chiefly due to increased war prices, was a matter for anxious consideration. The report was adopted, as was also the treasurer's statement of accounts, which showed a debit balance of £4 2*s*. 6*d*. Congregational collections remained the same, but subscriptions were £5 less than the previous year. Satisfactory reports were received from the aided churches, except from Devonport, where a monthly service is held with a view to missionary effort after the war. At Cheltenham, not aided, it is thought that nothing to revive the cause can be done with success while the war continues. At Colyton, also unaided, where the congregation had from various causes fallen to very small numbers, the services are continued by the secretary, Mr. Richards, with some increase in attendance. A cordial welcome on his settlement in the province was given to the Rev. Dr. W. Tudor Jones, who in response spoke of the special need of the message of our churches at this time. The members of the Assembly were particularly pleased to have among them the veteran Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Cullompton, and to hear his animated speech on the value of a local magazine and a district minister, especially in a province so large as the Western. At the close of the meeting ministers and delegates were entertained to tea by the Taunton congregation, to whom hearty thanks were given.

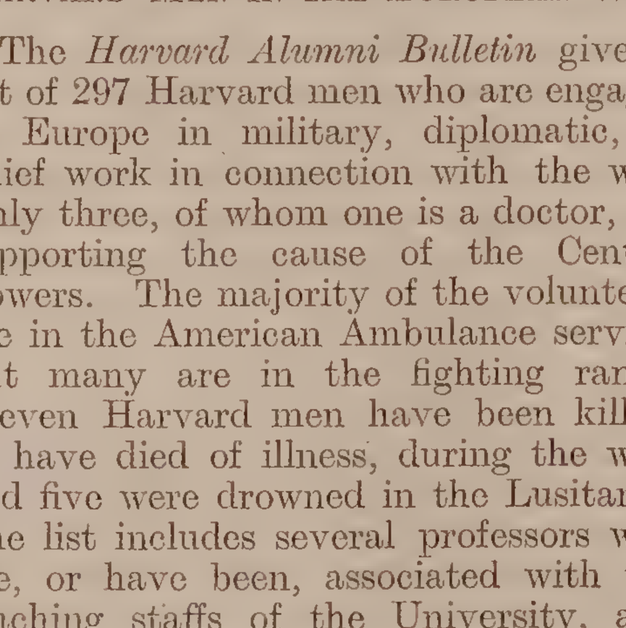
Winnipeg, Canada.—The annual business meeting of All Souls' Church was held on January 18, when the officers were elected for the ensuing year: E. T. Howorth being President; J. H. T. Falk, Secretary; A. G. Manning, Treasurer; and the Board of Trustees consisting of Mrs. Puttee, as representing the Women's Alliance, and Messrs. Ransom, Puttee, Drewe, Clark, and Stapley. An amendment was made to the Constitution, by which the church became an open fellowship. Previously all who became members had to sign a Bond of Fellowship which carried credal implications, though very broad and simple in its wording. In future the only requirement is that members declare themselves "in sympathy with the expressed aims and objects of the church." An open meeting of all friends and adherents was held on February 8, addressed by the retiring President, Mr. E. J. Ransom, the incoming President, the Secretary, and the Pastor, and also by the senior member of the church, Mr. A. W. Puttee, who gave some reminiscences of earlier days. Mr. Falk made a stirring appeal for social service work among the members, and also outlined his hopes for increasing the membership. There was a pleasant feeling of comradeship amongst all present, which spoke well for the future progress of the organisation. Dr. Westwood gave a series of sermons on 'The Theology of Democracy,' which drew good attendances, and has also opened a Wednesday evening class in Bible Study which is well supported. An indiscreet attack by an orthodox clergyman, which called forth a dignified open letter in the press from Dr. Westwood, gave useful publicity to the church, and has increased attendances at the services. The Women's Alliance holds one business and one sewing meeting each month, and the Choir has arranged two successful socials. It was decided to hold a week's mission services in Easter Week under the title 'God's Challenge to the Man Who has broken with His Church,' the results of which were awaited with interest.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

Giving a Hero his Chance.

The Rev. J. H. Bateson, of the Wesleyan Army and Navy Board, speaking at the Annual Meeting of the British Women's Temperance Association this week, told the story of a Lancashire lad who was formerly in the army, but had been turned out of it with ignominy because he could not give up the drink. He formed the resolution that he would change his way of life, and when the present war broke out saw a chance of winning back the good character he had lost. At the recruiting office, however, it was discovered that he had been in the army before, and that he had been dismissed from it, so he was told that such men as he were not wanted, and "turned down." The same thing happened when he made a second attempt. Finally, in desperation, he conceived the idea of writing to the King. He began in his untutored way, "Dear King," and proceeded to explain that he had been a "bad lad," that he had now, under the guidance of God, started on a new path, and wanted to re-enter the army. A letter was duly sent to him by the King's Secretary, which he was told to take to the recruiting officer, and a proud fellow he was when the magic words had procured him the high privilege he coveted of fighting for his country. The rest of the story is just what it ought to be. As he was a trained soldier the Lancashire lad was sent at once to the firing line, and only a week or two ago he was one of six men who, together with an officer, set out for that "No-man's land" of wire entanglements between the British and German trenches to carry out a particularly dangerous job. They were detected by the enemy, and subjected to a hail of fire, with the result that he himself was killed, but not until he had performed deeds of heroism in carrying his wounded officer and two of his comrades back to their own trench which would have won him the V.C. had he lived.

The Study of Shakespeare.



Mr. H. B. Irving said the other day that incalculable harm is being done—and it is getting more deplorable every day—by the way Shakespeare is made a "subject" in school. "I would have every school not teach Shakespeare," he said, "but take the children to see Shakespeare acted." In an address given before the performance of 'The Taming of the Shrew' by the girls of a Dramatic Class at a certain County Council School in the Borough last week the Rev. Stewart Headlam said very much the same thing, and earnestly impressed upon his hearers the fact that Shakespeare wrote his plays to be acted on the stage, not read in the study. People, he said, should seize every opportunity of going to see the plays performed before they read them, while they were reading them, and after they had read them; better still, they should themselves act in them, and promote entertainments such as the one they had come to see that afternoon—a far more delightful and humanising experience than going to see "the pictures." The girls on this occasion—they come, of course, from the poorer classes, and live in one of the dingiest and least inviting districts of London—acted with vivacity and real intelligence, and it was quite clear that they had not only been carefully trained, but that they enjoyed the whole thing tremendously.

Rainfall and Summer Time.

Dr. H. R. Mill has written to The Times from the offices of the British Rainfall Organisation as follows:—"The diurnal period of meteorological phenomena has not been interfered with by the Summer Time Bill, but confusion, as my correspondence already shows, has been brought into the minds of hundreds of rainfall observers who wish to know at what o'clock the 9 A.M. observations should be made. It is impossible for me to communicate with the 5,000 voluntary observers in the British Isles before the appointed day, and it would help to minimise one of the unfortunate results of the new Act if you could find space to print the following instruction: From May 21 to September 30 observers of rainfall should, if possible, read the rain gauges at 10 A.M. summer time (i.e., 9 A.M. Greenwich time). If this is impossible the readings may be made at 9 A.M. summer time, and the fact recorded on each page of the observation book and on the return."

Harvard Men in the European War.

The Harvard Alumni Bulletin gives a list of 297 Harvard men who are engaged in Europe in military, diplomatic, or relief work in connection with the war. Only three, of whom one is a doctor, are supporting the cause of the Central Powers. The majority of the volunteers are in the American Ambulance service, but many are in the fighting ranks. Eleven Harvard men have been killed, or have died of illness, during the war, and five were drowned in the Lusitania. The list includes several professors who are, or have been, associated with the teaching staffs of the University, and among the names occurs that of Robert Emmet (reminiscent of the rising in Ireland in 1803), described as "Major in Warwickshire Territorials: has become a British citizen."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14 Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

IT is good to turn away even for a few moments from the burden and anxiety of conflict to a world where children can still be made happy even under the most forlorn conditions. Our readers will remember that we have been sending out large parcels of clothing for the boys and girls in the Colonies Scolaires Belges in France. To-day we give them the pleasure of reading some of the letters of thanks which we have received. We do this for a special reason which we confess gives us a momentary pang of regret. The needs of the children will be in other hands for the future, thus releasing the efforts of our working parties for the needs of the Belgian sick and wounded in the military hospitals, which are not likely to grow less in the coming months. May we plead that there should be no relaxing of effort, because one small department of our work, which we took up as an "extra" when no one else was looking after the pressing needs of the children, will now be supplied from another source.

BUT let us explain. A delightful scheme has been organised in connection with the schools under the London County Council for supplying clothes to refugee children. The first idea was to help the Serbian children in Corsica and Greece, but Belgian children in Holland are to be included as well. Mr. Bernard M. Allen in his official capacity as Deputy Education Officer for London has a large controlling influence over this scheme, and being in close personal touch with our work he has been able to extend its activities to the Colonies Scolaires Belges in France as well. Our Fund may congratulate itself that it has been the means of introducing them to these new benefactors, and at the same time all who have contributed to their needs hitherto in response to our appeals may be quite satisfied that a most necessary piece of work has been accomplished with the happiest possible results. We shall of course keep in touch with the children and watch for new needs as they arise.

AND now for a few specimen letters. We offer no apology to our readers for giving the first place to these bright young voices before we pass on to the grave questions of the hour.

A boy writes :—"It is in the name of the children of our school that I write to you to express our warmest thanks. This generosity, this affection shown to us by people so far away, makes our exile less hard, and with all our hearts we thank you and those who have helped in this kind work. Every day we pray for our benefactors, and we shall always remember their kindness to us."

A girl writes :—"We have always been taught to be grateful to those who are good to us, so that it is a pleasure to us to send our very warm thanks to you and all the generous members of your Society for the big bale of clothes of all sorts which you have so kindly sent us. It is so nice for us, exiled and so far away from our dear Belgium, to feel that there are generous hearts thinking about us."

A boy writes :—"We are so happy to send you our thanks for all the clothes which you have sent us so kindly. What a lovely surprise it was for us! We never had such nice boots before. We like them so much and thank you for them warmly. We have no other means than these of showing our gratitude."

A girl writes :—"It is a great joy to me to write to you in the name of all the children here to tell you that we have already seen all the beautiful clothes. They are very pretty. We are looking forward to next Sunday when we shall put them on for the first time. We all want to thank you very much indeed."

BY the time these words are in the hands of our readers the Military Service Bill will be the law of the land. We have to accept and use it as an instrument for the deliverance of our country. It is not the will of a militarist Government but our own needs and our obligations to our Allies which have imposed it upon us. Even those who dislike it most will do well to consider the advantages of better organisation and less spasmodic methods of recruiting, which were emphasised the other day by Lord Kitchener. At the same time it will be in accord with all our best political traditions that its operation should be watched by an alert civilian opinion. Possible abuses can be checked and the necessary limitation of personal liberties reduced to a minimum by a wise vigilance. But it is essential that this should be done without the heat of partisanship or the suggestion of any necessary antagonism between the citizen and the soldier; for the soldier in the present war is simply the citizen in arms.

One of the best comments upon the situation is contained in the speech which was made last week by Sir Edward Grey in honour of the Russian representatives who have been visiting this country. These are not the words of a military advocate, but of a man who never forgets the great traditions of English freedom and his own passionate love of peace.

> I hope [he said] that in the visit which our Russian guests have paid they have seen enough to make them feel sure that in this country we are putting everything we possess into the struggle, whether it be men, ships, money, or matériel. We want our contribution to be the greatest that it is in the power of the country to make. We want it to be given in degree, and in kind, in the manner which is most suitable and helpful to our Allies and to the common cause. We have, during the time of this visit, been engaged in Parliament in passing what is called the Military Service Bill. To our Allies that may, perhaps, seem a small thing. I think, naturally, because they are used to the idea which is behind military service, but to us in this country, with the difficult problems with which we have to deal, it is really a big thing, because it is something different from all our previous traditions and ideas. I would like that to be taken by our Allies as a sign and evidence of how deeply this country is stirred and how determined it is that it shall not be behind any of them in the struggle.

We have referred elsewhere to Lord Kitchener's speech in the House of Lord's on Monday on the subject of conscientious objectors. The matter is so important in the present state of controversy that it may be well to set it out in full. He recognised, he said, that the question of the disposal of conscientious objectors after they had come into the army had raised feeling in various parts of the House and had caused considerable anxiety. He had gone very carefully into the matter with the authorities at the War Office, and they were of opinion that under the powers possessed by the Army Council they were in a position to deal with the matter in a manner which would meet the views of noble lords, that is to say, that genuine conscientious objectors would find themselves under the civil power. The difficulty of discriminating between different classes of alleged conscientious objection to military service was one of extreme delicacy, but he felt convinced that they would find a satisfactory solution. This view of the situation has met with strong support from an officer of experience in a letter to The Times, in which he points out that army officers would be glad to be relieved of the responsibility of dealing with these men. He feels that fair play demands that there should be lenience in some cases and severity in others, and the ordinary court-martial cannot exercise this kind of discrimination.

A happier side of this controversy has come to light in the descriptions which have appeared in the press of the activities of the first drafts of the non-combatant corps in France. Mr. Philip Gibbs, writing to The Manchester Guardian, says that for the most part they seemed to be men of good physique, and in answer to his questions they said that they had no complaints to make and were satisfied with their treatment. One of their officers said: "They are well behaved and do all that one tells them to do. There has been no crime and no need of punishment. They are anxious to do this work well, and don't 'grouse.' That is all one can expect of them, and there is no fault to find." The correspondent of The Times writes in a similar strain. He assures us that there appears to be no shadow of complaint of any harsh treatment, while they are leading a life which will be of immense physical benefit to every man of them, and are doing work of which hereafter they will be justifiably proud. "The best service that can be rendered them," such is his sensible conclusion, "is to forget them, or think of them only as men who are rendering what service they conscientiously can to their country in her need, just like any other patriotic Britons."

There are many favourable signs that the mood of unlimited admiration of German methods in education is passing away. Under the first astonishing impression of the strength which Germany has achieved through rigid organisation and devotion to the practical side of scientific knowledge, there was a disposition to say that we must cast all our traditions into the melting-pot and go and do likewise. But reflection and the revelation of grave moral weaknesses in German character are leading to some revision of judgment. There are, no doubt, many dead things in our schools and universities which should be cast away to the owls and the bats, and there are endless hints and suggestions to be gleaned from our German rivals. But the discipline of the past few months has brought with it a deeper insight into the true sources of strength, and we are glad to see that our leaders in the educational world are beginning once again to remind us that technical drill along certain highly specialised lines can never take the place of the gradual unfolding of all the spiritual resources of life and the training of character and imagination. Our aim must be to produce men and women who are good fathers and mothers and good citizens as well as good workers with superior technical skill. Is it too much to hope that the churches will throw themselves with ardour and conviction into this constructive work and shake themselves free from all the paralysing religious controversies which have retarded their influence upon educational progress so grievously in the past?

* * *

It has been discovered that the sudden rise in the economic value of the boy is creating a crop of new problems which require firm and sympathetic handling. His high wages make him independent of control and extravagant in the way he spends his money. He is also contracting a habit of leaving his work whenever he is annoyed by some slight grievance because he can find a job so easily elsewhere. The Workers' Welfare Department of the Ministry of Munitions has devised a scheme for dealing with this undesirable restlessness and lack of discipline. A supervisor is to be appointed and paid by the management of each factory in which a large number of boys is employed. It will be his duty to look after the health and comfort of the boys, to inquire into alleged grievances, and by personal interviews or a visit to the home to try to remove the cause of trouble. He will also be told the wages which each boy earns, and this will enable him to appreciate the boy's financial position in his home, and to devise the best means for encouraging him to save. There is here a new field of service for men with experience of social work

CONSCIENCE, FREEDOM, AND THE PUBLIC GOOD.

WE print to-day two protests on behalf of conscientious objectors to military service. So far as they plead for equality of treatment by the tribunals and the mitigation of any harsh or unsuitable punishment which may have been inflicted upon the offenders they will arouse widespread sympathy. Fortunately they have become almost unnecessary, for Lord Kitchener made the gratifying announcement in the House of Lords on Monday that in future genuine conscientious objectors would find themselves under the civil power. We do not take this to mean that no stern action will be taken against them for their acts of disloyalty to public law, but that all undue severity will be eliminated and proper consideration will be given to different cases. This should go far to allay all reasonable anxiety, and to remove the unfortunate impression which exists in some quarters that men are being persecuted for conscience' sake.

In so far as these protests use language of that kind and lend their support to the position that a conscientious objector is being treated unjustly, if he is not allowed to do what he likes and to shape his conduct without regard to the safety and welfare of other people, we are bound to confess that they fail to win our assent. In their devotion to certain sacred phrases, which still tingle with the memories of battle, they come dangerously near to giving their support to a doctrine of universal anarchy, in which the right to disagree would be the only ultimate bond of union. It is a simple and logical theory, and has made safe and pleasant sailing for many of us in days of peace when there was no feeling of common danger in the air, but it does not carry us very far in a stern struggle for existence. We have pleaded over and over again for the duty of hard thinking upon these fundamental problems of social obligation, and the limitations which personal freedom must accept if it is not to commit suicide. The language of these protests is a strong reinforcement of our plea, for they make a direct appeal to the emotions and prejudices of other days, without pausing to consider whether they are applicable to the very different problems of duty and policy with which we have to deal.

For the majority of people it is not true to say that men are being persecuted for their opinions. Except in a few cases, where the tribunals may have exceeded their powers and withheld from them their full legal rights, they are being punished for disobedience to a law which has been enacted in the public interest. It is held by those who are trustees for the safety of the nation, in face of the gravest peril that has ever threatened its life, that the time has come when every able-bodied citizen of military age must be called upon to fulfil the acknowledged obligations of his citizenship. If he refuses to serve in any capacity except on his own terms, he cannot plead that he is simply taking risks for himself. He is to the limit of his own power undermining the security of his fellow-citizens and by the force of inaction taking sides with the enemy. In these circumstances he has no right to complain if some restraint is imposed upon his dangerous conduct in order to safeguard the life of the community. Probably very few of the eminent men who have signed these protests would carry their argument so far as to plead for immunity for everybody who refuses to pay his taxes or to obey the lighting regulations on the East Coast, on the ground that it is against his conscience to do anything to help the war; but the moral difference between acts of this kind and the refusal of non-combatant service is not very clear to the ordinary mind. If the defiance of conscience is to be accepted as a legitimate difference of opinion which must be subject to no constraint in the one case, why not in the others? Or will the protesters carry their moral logic to its extreme limit, and defend the position that in no circumstances can the common will both command and exact obedience from those who desire to resist it without laying itself open to the charge of intolerance and persecution? What we all desire is to eliminate any spirit of vindictiveness and to make the restraint as suitable as possible to high-minded men, whose action at the moment is held by the majority to be dangerous to the public interest; but we shall accomplish this best by banishing from our arguments all violent language about intolerance and persecution, which has no suitability for the occasion.

We must also enter a demurrer on our own part to the idea which has appeared in some quarters lately, that the existence of our religious liberties is in some way involved in this question. The protesters exhort all Christian people "to reflect upon their own religious history, to remember by what great sacrifices in the past their present liberties have been won, and what grievous harm has been done to the cause of religion by persecution and intolerance." Most of us need to be reminded, and not least in these days, of our debt to the past and of the price which was paid for our freedom; but we need not on that account become the victims of a false historical analogy. If we examine the long struggle for Nonconformist liberties in this country, with which many of our readers will be familiar, we find that it resulted in a gradual victory for equal laws and the full privileges of citizenship. It was never a claim that every man should be a law unto himself and turn religion into an instrument of social disintegration. But after all analogies drawn from the past, on whichever side we may press them, are of small value in present circumstances, for we have never been in a situation with even a remote resemblance to our present duties and dangers before. The problems are new and we must meet them with a new clarity of thought and a new resoluteness of will, not imagining that all we have to do is to command the service of old watchwords or to furbish up the weapons of past controversies in order to cut a straight path through the unprecedented difficulties of the present hour.

We do not expect universal agreement on all these topics in our own country. Here we can still argue and let decision wait upon discussion, and it is well—so long as action is not delayed and security imperilled. But everything we think and everything we do must be governed by the fact that our choice is a practical one between successful effort and irretrievable disaster, and there is no middle course. Men of education in France realise this more clearly than we are able to do, because the biting wind of danger is always in their faces and the German lines are only forty miles away from Paris.

"The danger that threatens intellect in schools and academies," M. Boutroux writes in his recent book on Philosophy and War, "is that it takes itself as an end—i.e., allows itself to be led astray by the evidence and the harmony of its conceptions or by the elegance of its reasonings, and this confuses its own ideas with reality. The intellect which feels responsible only to itself constantly risks plunging into one or other of two shoals: dogmatism or dilettantism. In war, however, this dual danger is eliminated. Here, every conception is an action, and every action is immediately confronted with reality. In war, a false conception or a sophistical reasoning constitutes a defeat or a disaster; we are compelled never to think except in terms of deeds, to entertain only such ideas and reasonings as are at the same time tangible realities."

"Never to think except in terms of deeds," this is the lesson which many of us have had to learn in this hard school of danger and sacrifice and quick decision. If the vast majority of thinking people in this country are of the same mind, they are not to be accused of disloyalty to conscience and freedom because they cheerfully subordinate many of their private preferences to the need of common action and realise that there is a time to agree as well as a time to object. They have simply accepted reasonable limits to personal freedom and taught conscience to accept the noble language of a common obedience, because it is not given to them in any other way to defend their homes or to guard the treasures of the soul for the human race. Where there is unfairness let it be corrected. Where there is unbridled violence let it be rebuked and chastised. By all ways and all means let us keep our hearts sensitive to every claim of justice and kindness. But there are occasions when we must be stern towards recalcitrants against the common good, however noble their private motives may be, lest we surrender the interests of the whole into the hands of a faction, and with the watchwords of liberty upon our lips betray our cause into the hands of the spoiler.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

CALL ON US.

WHEN the enemy is near thee,
Call on us!
In our hands we will upbear thee,
He shall neither scathe nor scare thee,
He shall fly thee and shall fear thee.
Call on us!

Call when all good friends have left thee,
Of all good sights and sounds bereft thee;
Call when hope and heart are sinking,
When the brain is sick with thinking,
Help, O help!
Call, and following close behind thee,
There shall haste and there shall find thee,
Help, sure help.

When the panic comes upon thee,
When necessity seems on thee,
Hope and choice have all foregone thee,
Fate and force are closing o'er thee,
And but one way stands before thee,
Call on us!

Oh, and if thou dost not call,
Be but faithful, that is all.
Go right on, and close behind thee,
There shall follow still and find thee,
Help, sure help.

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.

THE three Dialogues which treat of the trial and death of Socrates—the Apology, the Crito, the Phaedo—are probably to be regarded, not so much as having a claim to historical truth, but rather as containing and developing the view of Socrates' life and character which Plato wishes to impress upon us....He may well have thought that the time had come for him to leave the mortal scene. He was already seventy years of age, and the future could have afforded little to tempt him....The speech breathes throughout a spirit of defiance, "ut non supplex aut reus sed magister aut dominus videretur esse judicum."....He wishes them to know that the divine sign never interrupted him in the course of his defence; the reason of which, as he conjectures, is that the death to which he is going is a good, and not an evil. For either death is a long sleep, the best of sleeps, or a journey to another world in which the souls of the dead are gathered together, and in which there may be a hope of seeing the heroes of old—in which, too, there are just judges; and as all are immortal, there can be no fear of anyone being put to death for his opinions....A man who is good for anything ought not to calculate the chance of living or dying; he ought only to consider whether in doing anything he is doing right or wrong—acting the part of a good man or of a bad.

"Wherefore, O judges, be of good cheer about death, and know this of a truth—that no evil can happen to a good man, either in life or after death. He and his are not neglected by the gods; nor has my own approaching end happened by mere chance. But I see clearly that to die and be released was better for me; and therefore the oracle gave no sign....The hour of departure has arrived, and we go our ways—I to die, and you to live. Which is better God only knows."

HAVE mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us; comfort the orphan, the needy, the afflicted, the stranger, the sorrowful, and the fallen; relieve the oppressed, gather together the dispersed, recall the captives, visit the sick, blot out the sins of the penitent; pour out on all Christian people the abundance of Thy help; grant soundness of mind and body to travellers and prisoners, and to all the faithful; wipe out our many offences, and of Thy great mercy grant to the departed eternal rest. Amen.

OUR DEAD HEROES.

"BUT lately out here death has grown so much softer. Nearly all the friends who came with us from —— to —— are now dead. Yet each one seems not so far away as if he had gone to India or America. Death has lost its distance and separation."

Why should these words, extracted from a letter from a young officer at the front, himself wounded, appeal with a force quite other than that of the ordinary "consolations of religion?" After all they contain no novel thought. What they tell us is what all Christians profess to believe. Yet they come with a power which no mere doctrinal statement has. They carry a conviction which no argument can produce. They are the words of one who has been there and seen and felt that which we commonly only talk about, one who has faced death, not once nor twice only, but constantly for many weeks, and realised the worst that death can do, and having so seen and realised, dwells in a sure and settled conviction that his friends do live. For him the matter is no longer open to argument any more than was their love for him or his for them.

Here we are reminded of those lines from Tolstoi's 'War and Peace,' quoted in 'The Spirit of Man.' "No, I only say that it is not arguments that convince one of the necessity of a future life, but the fact that one has been going through life in fond companionship with another, and suddenly that dear one vanishes there into the nowhere, and you yourself are left on the brink of the chasm looking down into it. And I have looked."

If this officer's words are in any way typical of the thought and feeling of the better men at the front then this war may yet do a great work for our religion, may help us to realise the truth of two of the central doctrines of Christianity in a way we have never done before—Immortality and the Spiritual Life. It may change assent into conviction, and an uncertain hope into one that is strong enough to sustain and profoundly modify our own lives when we, too, suffer loss. Death has only to become frequent and insistent enough for us to get used to his terrors and find out what an impostor he is. That is just what is happening out there in the battle line. We need to get used to death before we can understand it, and those who are most used to it, fear it least, for themselves or for their friends. That body which is wounded and perishes is but the chief weapon of their earthly combat. Its loss does not mean their loss any more than would the loss of sword or rifle. They are but suspended from the present fight, prisoners if you will, in the friendly custody of God. So I interpret that letter.

What a great thought it is! how helpful and inspiring, yet bringing with it what deepened sense of responsibility for us, who all are, or ought to be, engaged in some way in the great struggle from which they are removed, in which they have played their part as men should. We think of them watching us, so intently, so eagerly, to see how we are playing our part and upholding the great cause. Are we shrinking or shirking, scheming for ourselves, unwilling to follow in their steps and take up the duty they have been obliged to yield into our nerveless hands? O, the pity and the shame of it as it must seem to them, and ought to seem to us. Are we rising to the height of such opportunities as come to us, showing ourselves worthy that they should have suffered for us? O, the pride and joy with which our dead yet living heroes will one day welcome us again! IGNOTUS.

THE LATE ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—As one who, from training and inclination, belongs to a long line of Unitarians I should like to enter a protest on your notice last week of Archdeacon Wilberforce. You speak of his "nebulous theology." If a theology which could include Jews and Gentiles, Indians and persons of all creeds be nebulous and yet hold all these together, then I have nothing further to say; but Wilberforce's teaching was much more. It was strong and vital, it taught us how to live with a background of spirituality full of poetry and the tenderest helpfulness. "Religion is not a creed but conduct, not orthodoxy but activity," is what he said—life, in fact, and in that life to feel that the divine is within and is not an external coldness, divine, but far off, has helped Unitarians to be broader in mind. That one could not go all the way with him made one love his personality all the more, and if there are waves of thought reaching beyond the grave he now knows how many are thankful for his help.

You say, too, that he was not a great thinker. Perhaps the great thinkers have not been the most helpful or sympathetic to the mass of people of mediocre minds who need comfort. It is not everybody who can understand profound thinkers, but they can and do understand the man who teaches pure Christianity. The test of a great teacher is the work that is accomplished by his pupils, and those who have come under the teaching of Archdeacon Wilberforce will carry with them through life the influence of his thought.—Yours, &c.

[May we in mild self-defence point out to our correspondent that her letter rather tends to confirm our remark that the theology of Archdeacon Wilberforce was nebulous from the point of view of the standards of the Church of England. We fully endorse what she says of the penetrating charm of his personal influence, which agrees closely with our own estimate.—ED. of INQ.].

CASES OF CONSCIENCE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—As many of your readers will no doubt agree with you in your approval of Canon Rashdall's statement that the man who refuses to dig a trench when required to do so by the State is unfit for social life, may I suggest that it may be desirable to consider the purpose for which the trench is dug before pronouncing so sweeping a sentence on those who refuse to dig. Apart from this consideration the proposition simply begs the whole question, and is on a level with such statements as "The man who refuses to carry fagots to Smithfield at the command of the State is unfit for social life," "the man who refuses to put a pinch of salt on the fire at the command of the emperor is unworthy of the name of a Roman citizen." It may be worth while for us also to consider what we mean by saying that anything is "required by the State."—Yours, &c.
